Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas a question on this proposition: Is there any provision in this act to protect the Government in case of a settlement or compromise? That is, an allowance of alimony of $15 a month made to a divorced wife, where the husband subsequently comes in and settles all claims for subsequent alimony? Is there any provision here so that she would be entitled to receive any compensation from the Government? There are cases where the court makes an allowance of $10 or $15 or $20 per month. Afterwards the husband comes in and by the payment of $100 or $250 or some other certain sum a full compromise is made. I have a case of that kind in my district now, where the husband returned and settled in full the claim of the wife. Yet she is permitted, as I understand, still to draw money from the Government under her allotment.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know what construction the department has put upon a case of that kind, but my opinion is that if it were called to the attention of the department they would stop the payment of that allotment.

Mr. McKEOWN. There should be some rule about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the third and fourth paragraphs of section 204 of such act are hereby amended to read as follows:

"Class A: In the case of a man—

"(a) If there is a wife but no child, $15;

"(b) If there is a wife and one child, $25;

"(c) If there is a wife and two children, $32.50, with $5 per month additional for each additional child;

"(d) If there is no wife, but one child, $5;

"(e) If there is no wife, but two children, $12.50;

"(f) If there is no wife, but three children, $20;

"(g) If there is no wife, but four children, $30, with $5 per month additional for each additional child;

"(h) If there is a former wife divorced who has not remarried and to whom alimony has been decreed, $15.

"Class B: In the case of a man or woman—

"(a) If there is one parent, $10;

"(b) If there are two parents, $20;

"(c) If there is a grandchild, brother, sister, or additional parent, $5 for each.

"In the case of a woman, the family allowances for a husband and children shall be in the same amounts, respectively, as are payable, in the case of a man, to a wife and children, provided she makes a voluntary allotment of $15 as a basis therefor, and provided, further, that dependency exists as required in section 206."

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 12, strike out "$25" and insert "$35"; line 13, strike out "$32.50" and insert "$42.50"; line 15, strike out "$5" and insert "$15"; line 16, strike out "$12.50" and insert "$22.50"; line 17, strike out "$20," and insert "$30"; line 18, strike out "$30" and insert "$40."

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, since the passage of this bill we have raised the salaries of all the Federal employees $120 a year, which is $10 a month. This amendment applies only to allowances that have to do with children. If it is necessary to raise the salary of Federal employees on account of the high cost of living, it is certainly necessary to raise the allotment to children. For we all know that people can stand privations better than children, and it will be of small use to this Nation to save democracy for the race if at the same time we do not save the race for democracy.

Mr. RAYBURN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do trust that this amendment will not be adopted. It seems to me that it is most unnecessary. If a wife can get along on $15, she and her child can get along on $25, in addition to what the husband will donate.

Miss RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I will.

Miss RANKIN. Does not the gentleman recognize that a woman without a child can earn her own living. I would be willing to strike out the amount for the wife with no child, that she should receive no allotment, for she is able to earn her own living, while a woman with a child the allotment is not for the support of the woman, but to make it possible for the woman to support the child.

Mr. RAYBURN. The amount given a woman with one child is $40. That is more liberal than ever was provided before. If a man died in the Civil War, the wife got no insurance, for he had no right to take out insurance. He was in the Army of the United States, and the Government made no allowance to her of $15 for herself and no allowance of $10 for her child. In the administration of some of these laws somewhere, I do not know when it is going to come, we are going to have to stop one of these days and take stock and see what is the capacity of the American people to pay bills. We are going to come to it within 12 months if this war goes on. I trust that the House will not upon sentiment adopt this amendment.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. If I understand this measure, the soldier starts out with a pay of $30 a month. He pays one-half to his wife, and that is $15. If she has a child the Government adds $10 more, and therefore she would get $15 from the husband, $15 from the Government, with $10 more for the child.

Mr. RAYBURN. She would get $40 a month.

Mr. ROBBINS. If the amendment proposed by the lady from Montana is adopted, the Government is to add $10 more out of the National Treasury to the amount already allowed. The purpose of the amendment is to add $10 to the pay of the private soldier, and if the man was a sergeant, corporal, commissary sergeant, or quartermaster sergeant, the addition would be proportionately larger out of the National Treasury.

Mr. RAYBURN. No; it would be a flat amount of $10 more for each child.

Mr. ROBBINS. It would be $10 for every enlisted man whose wife had a child. How much would that amount to out of the National Treasury?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know, but quite a large sum.

Mr. ROBBINS. If we had a million and a half men in the field, it would be many million dollars.

Mr. RAYBURN. If they all had wives and one child. The majority of the men drafted, I understand, do not have a wife.

Mr. ROBBINS. It would add a great burden to the National Treasury to adopt this amendment, would it not?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Miss RANKIN. May I ask the chairman of the committee a question?

Mr. RAYBURN. Certainly.

Miss RANKIN. Is it not true according to the regulations for the next draft that men with children will not be drawn, so that this will not apply to any man in the coming draft?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know about that; they change the rules down there so often that I would not say what they will do in the next draft.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the Member from Montana.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The committee has made no change in the paragraph about which I desire to get some information, but I wish to inquire the reason for what seems to me an incongruity. When there is no wife, but one child living, the allowance is $5 a month, and when there are two children the amount is not twice that, but more than twice that, viz, $12.50.

Mr. RAYBURN. That would reduce the percentage, because the soldier can only allot $15 once. There will be two children to live off that in addition to the allowance the Government makes, whereas in the case of one child there would be $20 per month for that one child.

Mr. STAFFORD. And, proceeding further than that, when there are three children the allowance is $7.50 for the second one.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. But $5 is allowed for the first child.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; and that child alone gets the $15 allotment

Mr. STAFFORD. I was asked by a Member who is not now present to ascertain the reason for this difference.

Mr. RAYBURN. In the case of one child, it gets $20; in the case of two children, they would get $27.50; and in the case of three children, they would get $35.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That section 206 of such act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 206. That family allowances to members of Class B shall be paid only if and while the members are dependable in whole or in part on the enlisted man and then only if and while the enlisted man makes a monthly allotment of his pay for such members in the following amounts:

"(a) If an enlisted man is not making a compulsory allotment for Class A the allotment for Class B required as a condition to the family allowance shall be $15;

"(b) If an enlisted man is making a compulsory allotment for Class A the additional allotment for Class B required as a condition to the family allowance shall be $5, or if a woman is making an allotment of $15 for a dependent husband or child the additional allotment for the other members of Class B required as a condition to the family allowance shall be $5."

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 206 insert the following: Provided, That the family allowances to parents under this section shall be paid without regard to the dependency of such parents on the enlisted man.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question. What is the practice of the department now in regard to the determination of the question of dependency of parents?

Mr. RAYBURN. It is this: If a man was at home with them, they would be substantially dependent upon him for support.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment for this reason: I have received, I believe, more complaints about this allotment and allowance law from parents than from any other source. It seems that thousands and thousands of these men have filed their applications and have made these allotments, but have not set out in their applications the facts sufficient to justify the Government allowance. In many cases they have not even requested it. The parents continually write wanting to know why they do not get the Government allowance. That can be proved up, of course, but it seems to me that when the boys go into the Army and pay out of their wages $15 a month the Government then ought to give the parents the allowance provided in the law.

Mr. SNOOK. Is the effect of the gentleman's amendment this, that no matter how large an income the parents may have, if the boy makes an allotment the Government must pay them?

Mr. IGOE. Yes; no matter how much they have, because I believe this, if a boy sends home $15 out of his pay it is almost a certainty that the parents need not only that $15 but more.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman think that under his amendment, if it be adopted, nothwithstanding the boy may not have contributed anything to his parents' support, they ought to be allowed to make money out of his enlistment?

Mr. IGOE. I do not believe that they ought to make money out of his enlistment, and I do not believe any parents would want to do so, but if the boy has put out $15 a month, and he has to do that——

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. IGOE. He has to do that in order that they may get the allowance—if the gentleman will permit me to finish the sentence. Is not that true?

Mr. RAYBURN. Of course it is true, but unless there is a case of dependency he is not forced to allot this $15 a month?

Mr. IGOE. Here is the trouble about that. Many of these boys going in are under 21 years of age. Many of them come from college. They have not been obliged while at home to make any money, but they did render some sort of service. They have been a help to their parents. The gentleman asks if I want to allow parents to make money out of the boy's enlistment. No, I do not; but if a boy is giving $15 out of his pay to his father and mother, he would not do it unless they were in need, and I say that there are very few cases where money will be paid to parents who do not need it as compared with the cases where the boys make the allotment and where the parents do need the money. In many cases, these boys were living at home and rendering some service, perhaps not amounting to $25 a month, but it might have amounted to $15 a month. But if they can not say that they gave $25 a month or some sum in excess of $15 a month, they can not get the Government allowance.

Mr. SIMS. If the language is specific, might not the boy make an allowance to his parents of $10 a month just so as to qualify them to get that other $10 and make that much clear profit?

Mr. IGOE. I will tell you the way I feel about it. I think when parents send their boys into the Army and these boys send home $15 a month out of their pay, the parents should receive the Government allowance. I will take the chances of parents getting it who are not entitled to it rather than deprive parents who are entitled to it. I think when the soldiers pay out of their money this $15 a month to their parents there ought not to be any question of proof showing that they have contributed $25——

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Why does the gentleman say $25? Has the department adopted any rule of that kind?

Mr. IGOE. It must have been in excess of $15 to get the allowance. In order to get the allowance they must have contributed——

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. But the dependency might be in whole or part. It does not require the contribution of $25——

Mr. IGOE. But the parents will have to furnish proof, and inspectors and investigators will be sent to prove up some work, some little service rendered, so that it will appear that before his enlistment the soldier was contributing to his parents a sum equal to the allotment and allowance fixed in the law.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. They could show dependency. If the parents were able to prove dependency in part, that would be sufficient.

Mr. IGOE. I understand what the practice is, and that is my understanding, that they must have contributed——

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. To some extent.

Mr. IGOE. Yes; to an extent in excess of $15.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Well, I do not know——

Mr. IGOE. That is the fact.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the chairman of the committee understand there is such a ruling as that?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, there is great force in what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] has said. I have in mind several classes of cases in which parents can not get any benefit from this statute. The first is where a boy has been in school and has not been earning any money. The next is the case of the boy who has lived with his parents on a farm, perhaps not contributing anything in cash to the support of the family, but has contributed merely his labor, and you can not estimate that, you can not make proof of that so that the parent is able to get anything.

Then there is another class of cases in which the parent becomes dependent after the soldier enlists. There are instances in which the boy's father dies after he enlists. His mother perhaps is at home destitute. Previously she had relied upon his father for support, and now the son has gone away to the war, perhaps grown up to be a man since he went to the war, and she is unable to get one cent from the Government for her support beyond what her son allots to her.

Now, take the case of a soldier who has been in the Army for several years. He has been getting, we will say, $15 a month. I have in mind the case of the boys who went down to the Mexican border. They were volunteers. They were paid $15 a month or thereabouts. They belonged to the National Guard. They have now been called into the Federal service. In not one of those cases where the facts are truly presented are the parents able to get one single cent for their support, because the law and the rules of the bureau require that proof be made that the average monthly contributions by the soldier toward the support of his dependents for the year previous is equal to the sum of his present allotment and the allowance claimed. I have had dozens of cases involving that point.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. In just a moment. Proof must be made, as I know from actual experience with the department, that the average monthly contribution of a soldier for the year preceding the enlistment, if soldier enlisted after October 6, 1917, and if not, for the year prior to that date, was such an amount as will not equal his allotment and the amount that his family claims. Therefore, where men have been in service a year before October 1 and have not received more than $15 a month, they make this allotment of $15 a month to their parents, and yet they do not get a cent by way of support by the Government.

Mr. RAYBURN. I will say to the gentleman I had that matter up with the department awhile ago, and they told me their rule was, and it was a recent rule—it has been two months ago—that they determine this proposition of allowance and allotment on the present status and not upon what the status was before we went into war. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENSLEY]——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Just a moment.

Mr. RAYBURN. I shall take it up in my own time.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Certainly; if the gentleman will speak to it in his own time. I want to say this to the gentleman: I am amazed by his statement; not that I question his good faith, but because it is exactly the opposite to not less than 50 decisions that have been made with reference to such cases in my own district. They have held uniformly—I have never been able to get any other holding—they have held uniformly that the year during which this average monthly contribution must be proven should date October 6, 1917, or from the time the soldier was inducted into service if it was after that date. I say not less than 50 cases. I am filing daily affidavits and other proofs to show that the soldier did make this contribution.

I do not know whether other Members have fewer or more of these claims than I do, but there are 5 to 20 a day passing through my hands.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Here is a question I want to get at. That sort of a ruling is not warranted by the language of this act.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman show us how it is not warranted? The law provides there must be a showing of dependency, and the bureau makes the regulations, and how are we going to help ourselves? The gentleman, perhaps, in his humanity, would not make such a ruling.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; I would not.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. But you can not keep them from making it, and I do not know of any way to get anything different.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It is not a question of administration, then?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It ought to be a question of law. It ought to be plain. The right of the soldier to be able to get something for his dependent ones at home ought to be guaranteed to him and safeguarded by the statute itself, and not left in such shape that it may be taken away from him by some petty officer.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will.

Mr. BLACK. I just wanted to call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama to the fact that the fault does not lie with the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, because section 207 of the war-risk insurance act provides that the monthly allowance to those of class B shall not exceed so much, including the amount he allots, the sum he has contributed to the support, taking the 12 months next preceding the time he enlisted. It is really not a matter of department construction.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It appears that is impossible that the practice of the bureau should be different. So I take it the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] has been misinformed as to the facts. If he has been able to get any different construction of the law he has been much more successful than I have.

The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri ought not to have application to parents who are not in need, who are not in any sense dependent, but certainly the contribution the soldier has been making ought not to be the test. The test ought to be here in the law. Why is it that one soldier should be enabled to secure for his family a certain benefit when another soldier can not secure it, when they are identical in situation, and perhaps their devotion to their parents has been the same, but their earning capacity and ability to contribute to their parents has been different? We could well afford in a few instances to pay this money to somebody who actually does not need it in order to be sure it gets to the homes that do need it, in order that it might get to these destitute parents that suffer for it and who have given up their sons to fight our battles.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I think the argument of the gentleman from Missouri answers itself. It does not seem to me that the gentleman should here in a statute enact, where we are trying to take care of the dependents of the soldiers who are away and where the Government is putting millions into that fund to take care of those people who are the dependents of the soldiers, anything that would throw this matter open and give the opportunity to everybody, whether they have their millions or not, just simply because their sons happen to be called to the colors, to come in upon a parity with other people. We are voting money every day; we are issuing bonds; we are levying additional taxes upon the people of this country to take care of cases of dependency, and of dependency only. If a boy goes to the Army and leaves a father who is a strong man, able to support himself and his wife and his children, the Government of the United States does not owe it to that father that it should take out of the Treasury of this country money and pay it to him. He may be a man who has to earn his living by his own labor, or it may be a man who clips coupons and gets his living in that way. It does seem to me that after we have made this the most liberal law that was ever written upon the statute books of any country in the history of the world, that people should not come along here and propose, where probably one instance of an apparent injustice has come into the administration of the law, that we are to throw down the floodgates and allow people who have no justification in morals to come in to take this money from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it not a fact that if this amendment is adopted it not only applies to men who are drafted in the Army but to all who volunteer, and therefore might include every rich man's son who volunteers in the Army and who, in order to get an additional amount, would make an allotment to his parents, who in turn might deposit that to his credit?

Mr. RAYBURN. Absolutely. Where the man has dependents and is in the Army, if he himself does not make the allotment, his people can apply and the allotment be forced.

Mr. IGOE. You say that this all rests on dependency. Does the allowance to the wife depend on that question? Is not that made regardless of how much money she has?

Mr. RAYBURN. There is an obligation there.

Mr. IGOE. It is a question of what one owes to wife and parents. Is it not payable to the wife even if she has a million dollars?

Mr. RAYBURN. It is a legal obligation.

Mr. IGOE. I am not talking about legal obligations. I am talking about the payment by the Government under this law.

Mr. RAYBURN. One is voluntary and the other is compulsory.

Mr. ESCH. Did not this House within 10 days pass a pension bill denying a pension to certain soldiers where they had an income of $1,000 or more?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SWITZER. If the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] is adopted, the effect will be that the dependents can not make the application of their own motion?

Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, no. They can make it now, and they can hold it out, even though the soldier does not make an allotment, and the Government will add that to it.

Mr. SWITZER. If the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri is adopted, could they make this application themselves?

Mr. RAYBURN. It would not be necessary.

Mr. IGOE. All I have done under this amendment is to provide that where the allotment is made the Government allowance is paid. The parents can not get this allowance unless the man makes the allotment.

Mr. RAYBURN. No; whether he makes it or not the Government can make it for him.

Mr. IGOE. The only condition I have made is as to the parents. A man must make the allotment just the same.

Mr. RAYBURN. Where he makes the allotment now, and they are dependent, it is paid just the same.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That section 300 of said act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 300. That for death or disability resulting from personal injury suffered or disease contracted by any commissioned officer or enlisted man or by any member of the Army Nurse Corps (female) or of the Navy Nurse Corps (female) when employed in active service under the War Department or Navy Department, the United States shall pay compensation as hereinafter provided; but no compensation shall be paid if the injury or disease has been caused by his own willful misconduct."

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HAYDEN: Page 19, line 3, add the following at the end of the section:

"The provisions of this article shall also apply to death or disability resulting from personal injury suffered by any civil officer while heretofore or hereafter lawfully engaged in the execution of the act of May 18, 1917, and amendments thereto, known as the selective-draft law."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves a point of order on the amendment. Does the gentleman from Arizona want to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. HAYDEN. I would like to explain why I offer this amendment.

On the 10th day of February the sheriff of Graham County, Ariz., and two of his deputies were killed by two men who were of draft age, but who refused to register. The case was brought to my attention by the following letter from residents of the community in which these officers lived, which states that their widows are in need and that these men had come to their deaths in the enforcement of the selective-draft act:

SAFFORD, ARIZ., February 15, 1918.

To Senators M. A. SMITH and HENRY F. ASHURST, and Representative CARL HAYDEN,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: At a mass meeting of the citizens of Graham County held at the town hall in Safford on the evening of Tuesday, the 12th day of February, 1918, the undersigned committee was appointed for the purpose of submitting to you the following facts, with a view to securing Government aid for the families of Sheriff R. F. McBride and his deputies, Martin R. Kempton and Thomas K. Wootan, who were killed in the Galiuro Mountains in Graham County, Ariz., on February 10, 1918, by John Power, Tom Power, and Tom Sisson, while assisting deputy United States Marshal Frank Haynes in attempting to make an arrest of John and Tom Power, both of whom were slackers—evaders of the selective-draft act—and outlaws. The two Power boys had refused to register, and, although repeatedly offered leniency provided they would come in and join the Army, refused to do so, and the United States marshal directed Mr. Haynes to come to Safford to obtain aid and arrest them. Mr. Haynes secured the services of Mr. Wootan, and Sheriff McBride and Deputy Kempton accompanied them at Mr. Haynes's request. In attempting to make the arrest in the Galiuro Mountains these three officers were killed. We mail you a copy of the testimony taken at the coroner's inquest, which gives more in detail the circumstances attending the crime.

Mr. McBride was 44 years of age and leaves a family consisting of a wife and seven children, and there will also be a posthumous child to arrive in about two or three months. He leaves this family practically penniless, without even a home for them to live in. The eldest of these children is a girl about 16 years of age, and they range from that down to about 2 years. The eldest boy is about 14 years of age, so that they are practically helpless when it comes to the ability to earn a living. Mrs. McBride is a quiet, modest little woman. She is not now nor has she ever been strong. In fact, she will be almost helpless in looking after the material welfare of herself and children. Her relatives say she never even bought her own clothes, but depended upon her husband to make such selections as he thought best. Neither are there any relatives that are able to assist in any way.

Mr. T. K. Wootan was 36 years of age and leaves a wife and four little girls, ranging in age from 6 to 2 years. There will also be a posthumous child of this marriage within about three or four months. While Mr. Wootan owned a little property he was so much involved that if his wife, after settling up the affairs of the estate, is left with even a small home to live in, it will be as much or more than is now expected.

Mr. M. R. Kempton was a man of 40 years of age, and left a wife and seven children ranging in age from 15 to about 2 years. He has a 40-acre farm valued at $200 per acre, and is worth net about $10,000. The two eldest boys are in a way able to run the farm and the widow is not completely helpless, but it will be very difficult for them to earn a living upon the farm without eating in upon the principal.

Owing to the fact that these men were all in the service of the United States Government, Mr. Wootan directly in the employ of the United States marshal and Mr. McBride and Mr. Kempton assisting the United States marshal, who was unable to even attempt to make this arrest without the aid of the sheriff, and to the further fact that Mr. McBride has been a member of the local exemption board for Graham County, Ariz., and has for the past six months and more devoted a large part of his time both day and night to Government service, it would seem that these men have given up their lives in the service of their country the same as those who have died upon the field of battle, and the service was rendered without any hope or expectation of reward, but merely for the reason that these officers considered it in their line of duty.

Without the aid of the United States Government the families of Mr. McBride and Mr. Wootan may become county charges.

Respectfully submitted.

A. G. MCALISTER,
W. R. CHAMBERS,
LEE N. STRATTON,
E. L. SPRIGGS.
Committee.

I immediately took up the matter with the Commissioner of Pensions, asking to be advised as to whether pensions had ever been granted to the defendants of civilians who were killed under such circumstances and stated that I presumed that some civil officers had lost their lives in the draft riots during the Civil War. I received this reply:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 28, 1918.

Hon. CARL HAYDEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HAYDEN: Responding to your attached letter of the 23d instant, transmitting a copy of a resolution adopted at a mass meeting of citizens of Graham County, Ariz., on the 12th instant, addressed to the congressional delegation from Arizona, suggesting that the United States afford proper relief to the bereaved families of the late Sheriff R. F. McBride and his deputies, M. R. Kempton and T. K. Wootan, who are alleged to have been killed in the Galiuro Mountains in Graham

County, Ariz., on February 10, 1918, by John Power, Tom Power, and Tom Sisson, while assisting Deputy United States Marshal Frank Haynes in attempting to arrest John and Tom Power, evaders of the selective-draft act, I have the honor to state that as it appears that the sheriff and his deputies were not in the military service of the United States when they were killed there is no provision of the general pension law under which an allowance can be made in behalf of their widows and children.

It is, however, deemed proper to invite your attention to the fact that paragraph 5, section 4693, Revised Statutes of the United States, provides for the granting of pension to any provost marshal, deputy provost marshal, or enrolling officer disabled by reason of any wound or injury, received in the discharge of his duty, unable to procure a subsistence by manual labor.

Upon the statement of facts presented it would appear that the sheriff and his deputies above named were, when they met death, performing, in behalf of the United States, a service similar to that required of a provost marshal or deputy provost marshal. In view of the provisions of section 312, act of October 6, 1917 (38 Stat. L., 711), it is not within my province to make any recommendation in this matter, as the event referred to in said resolution occurred on February 10, 1918.

Very truly, yours, G. M. SALTZGABER, Commissioner.

In other words, the Commissioner of Pensions states that the old statute passed in 1863 relative to provost marshals was repealed by the war-risk insurance act which we are amending to-day.

Finding that I could not accomplish anything at the Pension Office I then went to the office of the Provost Marshal General, where I met Lieut. Col. J. H. Wigmore, the author of Wigmore on Evidence, who was kind enough to look into the case unofficially for me. Col. Wigmore said that since the selective-draft law provides that the President may call upon the civil officers of the States to enforce that act, consequently there is now no such officer as a provost marshal or deputy provost marshal. The fifth paragraph of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes therefore could not be of any benefit to the widows of the sheriff or his deputies. He suggested that if the provisions of article 3 of the war-risk insurance act were made applicable to any civil officer who suffered a personal injury while enforcing the selective-draft act, it would accomplish my purpose.

I have therefore offered this amendment, believing that the precedent established during the Civil War should be followed in the case of a civil officer who loses his life in the enforcement of the selective-draft act, and that his family should receive compensation. Every argument that was used to support the law passed in 1863 applies with equal force at the present time.

Mr. ROBBINS. Does not that merely come in to give the right to have a special act of Congress passed, based on the right in each particular case?

Mr. HAYDEN. No special act of Congress is required. The fifth paragraph of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes provides that any provost marshal, deputy provost marshal, or enrolling officer disabled by reason of any wound or injury received in the discharge of his duty may be pensioned.

Mr. ROBBINS. At what rate are they pensionable?

Mr. HAYDEN. Under the rates provided in the general law, the same as a soldier who was wounded in battle.

Mr. ROBBINS. Would that give a civilian employee a pensionable status, the same as the military employee?

Mr. HAYDEN. This is the only case where a civilian employee is given a pensionable status. As the gentleman will remember, in section 6 of the selective-draft act of last year it is provided—

That the President is hereby authorized to utilize the service of any or all departments and any or all officers or agents of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, and subdivisions thereof, in the execution of this act, and all officers and agents of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and subdivisions thereof, and of the District of Columbia, and all persons designated or appointed under regulations prescribed by the President, whether such appointments are made by the President himself or by the governor or other officer of any State or Territory to perform any duty in the execution of this act, are hereby required to perform such duty as the President shall order or direct, and all such officers and agents and persons so designated or appointed shall hereby have full authority for all acts done by them in the execution of this act by the direction of the President.

The sheriff who gave up his life for his country was duly appointed by the President as a member of the local board of Graham County, and he devoted his time for several months without compensation in the execution of the selective-draft act. He was called upon by the deputy United States marshal to go out and arrest these slackers, and in the performance of that duty he was killed. In order that the House may have a better understanding of the facts in this case I shall include the following Associated Press dispatch as a part of my remarks:

CLIFTON, ARIZ., May 17, 1918.

Thomas Powers, John Powers, and Thomas Sisson were found guilty by a jury in the district court here to-day of murder in the first degree for killing three Graham County officers who attempted to arrest the Powers brothers on February 10 as alleged draft evaders.

The crime for which John and Tom Powers and Tom Sisson were convicted was the murder of Sheriff Frank McBride, Undersheriff Mart Kempton, and Deputy Sheriff Kane Wootan, of Graham County, at the Powers home in Rattlesnake Canyon, Graham County, on the morning of Sunday, February 10. The Graham County officers had gone to the Powers home accompanying Deputy United States Marshal Frank Haynes, of Globe, who held a warrant for the arrest of the two Powers boys for failing to register for the draft. According to Haynes's story the officers surrounded the house and called upon the men to come out. Jeff Powers, the father, came out with a rifle in his hands and was ordered to throw up his hands. As he was complying the door of the house opened and one of the Powers boys opened fire. In the exchange of shots that followed the elder Powers fell, mortally wounded. In the melee that followed McBride and Wootan were killed. Kempton, kicking in the rear door of the house, was killed by Sisson.

The most remarkable man hunt in the history of southern Arizona followed, practically every peace officer in the section of the State, hundreds of civilian possemen and United States military forces participating. The outlaws evaded all traps and cordons, however, and escaped into Mexico, where they were apprehended and taken into custody by United States soldiers a few miles south of the line. The case was tried at Clifton, Greenlee County, whence it was taken on a change of venue from Graham County.

SAW OLD MAN DROP.

Deputy United States Marshal Haynes was the principal witness for the prosecution. He testified that Jeff Powers, the father, appeared at the east door of the cabin and heard the deputies command him to throw up his hands. He saw Powers's rifle held across his breast, and then the old man dropped the weapon to his right side.

Shooting occurred from the door in two directions, toward Haynes and Sheriff McBride. The witness said he saw Powers fall. He was sheltered behind the shed and fired in the north window. He saw McBride on the ground dead, but did not know that his deputies were dead. He said he did not know who shot Jeff Powers. Leaving the scene, he tried to approach from another direction, and, failing, remounted and rode to the Church ranch for assistance.

John Murdock, a rancher, told how the three defendants came to his ranch after the fight and said that each had killed an officer—that Sisson had killed Sheriff McBride, John Powers killed Deputy Kempton, and Tom Powers killed Deputy Wootan.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, should Congress launch into the policy of extending compensation to civilian officers engaged in the enforcement of the selective-draft law when injured, it would require the Government to extend similar protection to other civilian officers in the execution of other laws, as, for instance, postal employees who would be in foreign camps engaged in the distribution of mail to the enlisted forces. We have abroad a large number of clerks connected with the Auditor for the War Department. They, too, might suffer injury, and if we allowed this amendment to be in order it would be in order to attach an amendment extending protection to that character of employees.

This subject has not received consideration by any committee of the House, and I feel constrained to make the point of order that it is not germane.

I call the attention of the chairman to section 300, under consideration, and the Chair will notice that it is limited exclusively to those in the general class in the military service of the Government. Let me direct the chairman's attention to what it is. Section 300 is the basis of the compensation to the enlisted men and officers of the Army and Navy; otherwise the pension feature of the war-insurance bill. This is the general section which covers all classes to which all of these provisions extend. I have before me the original section, and I now read the amended section which differs very slightly from the original section:

SEC. 300. That for death or disability resulting from personal injury suffered or disease contracted by any commissioned officer or enlisted man or by any member of the Army Nurse Corps (female) or of the Navy Nurse Corps (female) when employed in active service under the War Department or Navy Department, the United States shall pay compensation as hereinafter provided; but no compensation shall be paid if the injury or disease has been caused by his own willful misconduct.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Chair will see that these classes are limited to one general class, and that is, those in the military service of the Government. If this bill would be presented as a separate bill involving section 300 alone, it would be necessary and incumbent on the Chair to rule that any amendment proposed involving a class entirely different, relating to civilian employees, providing for a pension or compensation to be paid civilian employees, to rule it out of order on the ground that it is not germane.

This bill as now presented is limited specifically to enlisted forces of the United States, the military arm of the United States, and does not provide for any compensation or insurance for anyone not in the enlisted force.

The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arizona is to extend protection to civilian officers administering the draft law. If the Chair holds it in order, I could offer an amendment to extend it to the post-office employees in connection with the delivery of the mail to the enlisted force abroad, or to the clerks abroad connected with the auditor's office of the War Department.

So I say, Mr. Chairman, the Chair can not escape from holding that it is not germane, because it relates to a different class entirely. This bill relates only to the enlisted force of the Army and the Navy, and the gentleman seeks to extend it to civilian forces of the Government.

Mr. HAYDEN. I have only this to say in regard to that, Mr. Chairman: Section 6 of the selective-draft law authorizes the President to call upon all the civil officers in the United States, or of the several States, to enforce that act, and thereby they become and are Federal officials, charged with the carrying out of that particular duty.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman mean by the President calling upon the parties to perform this duty that thereby they become a part of the enlisted force of the Government?

Mr. HAYDEN. I did not say they became a part of the enlisted force.

Mr. STAFFORD. This bill is limited to the enlisted forces of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The only question is whether this amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona is germane. The whole bill applies to men in the Army and the Navy of the United States. The amendment seeks to make it embrace civil officers of the Government. The Chair does not think that that can be done under this bill and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. WALDOW. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Provided, That said person shall be entitled to this compensation after being served with order No. 1028 and such person has reported to the local board."

Mr. WALDOW. Mr. Chairman, my object in proposing this amendment is to offer the protection of this insurance to our soldiers at the time that they are inducted into the military service of the United States, and I have been vitally interested in all legislation affecting the welfare of our soldiers and sailors who have been inducted into our National Army, and I believe the act establishing a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance has been the most important legislation considered by any legislative body in the world, having in mind the welfare of the boys in our Army and Navy. Legislation of this importance and of such a radical departure from any legislation considered by Congress necessarily is in need of some amendments.

The amendment that I have proposed provides that a soldier or sailor will be entitled to all of the benefits of this act immediately upon being served by his local board with an order to report for military service. The present law does not insure or compensate the soldier or sailor until he has been accepted into the service at the cantonments and has been examined by the physician at that camp, this examination very often not taking place for three or four weeks.

I have in mind several of the men from my district who were injured during their first week at camp or in transit from their home city to the cantonment, and, if I may, recall to the committee's attention the accident of several weeks ago near the city of Albany, where many soldiers lost their lives or were injured, all of whom will not be able to take advantage of the provisions of this bill unless my amendment is adopted. In plain language, Mr. Chairman, I believe the moment the men are under orders from their local board they should be entitled to the compensation for accidents and illness that my amendment provides for.

I desire to take this opportunity to commend the committee for its many months of hard labor in perfecting and presenting this bill to Congress. In its provisions for dependents it goes far beyond the laws of any other country and the insurance feature provides that our soldiers and sailors shall receive insurance at a price within the reach of all and lower by 80 per cent than insurance could be obtained in any other manner.

Its popularity among the men is assured; less than 200,000 of the first million soldiers in camp failed to apply for insurance, most of those 200,000 soldiers not having any dependents, and I believe it is proper to state at this time that at the close of business on May 13, 1918, the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance had received 2,008,030 insurance applications, amounting to $16,461,705,000 worth of insurance, was issued to our soldiers and sailors. The average amount of insurance issued to each man amounted to approximately $8,000.

It is true there has been some delay in granting allotments and notifying dependents at home that their allotments or insurance policies were on file at the War-Risk Bureau, but when the magnitude of this amount of business it taken into consideration and we consider that this work is being accomplished by an entirely new bureau, I believe their work has been commendable.

I have taken up many cases for my constituents with this bureau and have always been able to receive a satisfactory, if not an immediate adjustment.

I hope all of the men from my district who have dependents will avail themselves of this law, and I am ready to advise or assist them, or their dependents at home, in explaining its provisions or in securing information relative to their allotments or insurance policies.

I sincerely trust the chairman of this committee and the Members of the House will approve of my amendment, as I believe it is a matter of doing justice to the thousands of boys we are calling upon to take their places in our National Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 3, after the word "misconduct." insert:
"Provided, That, for the purposes of this section, said officer, enlisted man, or other member shall be held and taken to have been in sound condition when examined, accepted, and enrolled for service."

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve the point of order upon the amendment. If the gentleman will permit, I will inquire what he means by the language "or other member"?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. That is the language used in the section.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, the gentleman is referring to members of the Army Nurse Corps.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me there should be no going behind the formal examination, acceptance, and enrollment of a soldier to show that he was not in good physical condition when he was accepted. When a soldier is discharged now for disability and makes application for compensation he is frequently confronted with his record, reciting that his disability was incurred prior to his enlistment.

This morning, in asking a question of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], I called attention to a case which has arisen in my district. This soldier enlisted in the Regular Army last May. He was examined and accepted to serve and served acceptably. He took all of the treatments which were required of him; he was examined a number of times and always found to be in good physical condition. In February of this year, nearly a year after the beginning of his service, he was found to have tuberculosis of a virulent type and was discharged from the service a few weeks later. He is now perhaps threatened with death. That soldier is confronted with a record, which his surgeon put on his discharge, that his disability was incurred before his enlistment. I took the matter up with the Surgeon General's office of the War Department and endeavored to have that grave injustice corrected, but I was informed that there is absolutely no way by which the certificate of the examining surgeon who discharged him could be reviewed. This disabled man is now confronted with the statement in his record that he had his disability before he went into the service. Therefore, under the terms of this statute, neither he nor those dependent upon him will ever be able to get any compensation. The question is hung up in the bureau as to whether proof will be admitted that he was previously in good health.

Heretofore the practice has been not to accept any such proof. The Pension Office declines to accept proof that the injury was in line of duty where the record shows it was not in line of duty. The Pension Office declines to accept proof that the disability was incurred in the service where the record shows that it was not incurred in the service, that the soldier had it before he enlisted. That is the question now before the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance. But if that issue should be favorably determined toward this particular soldier or any other soldier similarly situated he has to make proof of a negative. That is to say, he has to prove that he was not afflicted with this disease when he entered the service.

Such a construction of the law is most unjust, and such a law is most unjust. It works a great hardship. We should take it out of the power of any medical officer to rob a soldier of his right to compensation merely by putting that stigma on his record. In many cases the soldier will die in the service. The medical man can certify that he died of disease contracted before enlistment, and the soldier being dead, his comrades being absent and scattered, proof becomes almost impossible to be made and there is absolutely no remedy for his dependents, for his destitute parents, or for his wife and children.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. I agree fully with what the gentleman has said, but I understand there are cases where they accept men for limited service, noting on their acceptance that they have certain disabilities. How would the gentleman's amendment affect cases of that kind?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. That ought to be dealt with, of course, but necessarily in an amendment of this kind it is hard to deal with every aspect of a situation of that kind, and I take it we ought not to put this difficulty up in front of these people who sustain these disabilities because of the situation the gentleman has indicated. Of course, it would never be supposed that a man who was not sound physically would be accepted. Sometimes such men are accepted, but when they are accepted the Government ought to be foreclosed from ever afterwards denying that they were not in good condition. For illustration, men are accepted with slightly defective hearing for special service. Subsequently those same men may develop some other diseases, and it ought not to be permitted, even in the case of a man accepted for special service, that for some other disease not noted on his paper of enrollment it should be brought up against him. What I am trying to do is to fix it so that a man accepted for service in the Army of the United States, a man held to be good enough for a soldier, will afterwards be held good enough for a pension or for compensation when his disability shows itself.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin insist upon his point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I merely made the reservation of the point of order to inquire of the gentleman what he meant by the word "member," and I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I think that section 300 ought to be amended to make it effective as of the 6th of October, 1917; otherwise it would be unfair to those injured prior to this time, for they would be barred from recovery, and that is not the intention of this act.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to pass this over for the present, to return to it later when we can get this amendment perfected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to pass over this for the present. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That section 301 of said act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 301. That if death results from injury—

"If the deceased leaves a widow or child, or if he leaves a mother or father either or both dependent upon him for support, the monthly compensation shall be the following amounts:

"(a) If there is a widow but no child, $25.

"(b) If there is a widow and one child, $35.

"(c) If there is a widow and two children, $42.50, with $5 for each additional child up to two.

"(d) If there is no widow, but one child, $20.

"(e) If there is no widow, but two children, $30.

"(f) If there is no widow, but three children, $40, with $5 for each additional child up to two.

"(g) If there is a dependent mother or dependent father, $20, or both, $30. The amount payable under this subdivision shall not exceed the difference between the total amount payable to the widow and children and the sum of $75. This compensation shall be payable for the death of but one child, and no compensation for the death of a child shall be payable if the dependent mother is in receipt of compensation under the provisions of this article for the death of her husband. Such compensation shall be payable whether the dependency of the father or mother or both arises before or after the death of the person, but no compensation shall be payable if the dependency arises more than five years after the death of the person.

"If the death occurs before discharge or resignation from service, the United States shall pay for burial expenses and the return of the body to his home a sum not to exceed $100, as may be fixed by regulations.

"The payment of compensation to a widow shall continue until her death or remarriage.

"The payment of compensation to or for a child shall continue until such child reaches the age of 18 years or marries, or if such child be incapable, because of insanity, idiocy, or being otherwise permanently helpless, then during such incapacity.

"Whenever the compensation payable to or for the benefit of any person under the provisions of this section is terminated by the happening of the contingency upon which it is limited, the compensation thereafter for the remaining beneficiary or beneficiaries, if any, shall be the amount which would have been payable to them if they had been the sole original beneficiaries.

"As between the widow and the children not in her custody and as between children, the amount of the compensation shall be apportioned as may be prescribed by regulation.

"The term 'widow,' as used in this section, shall not include one who shall have married the deceased later than 10 years after the time of injury, and shall include a widower whenever his condition is such that, if the deceased person were living, he would have been dependent upon her for support."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 20, line 4, after the word "person," in line 4, strike out the balance of line 4 and all of lines 5 and 6, on page 20, the language stricken out, reading as follows: "but no compensation shall be payable if the dependency arises more than five years after the death of the person."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, this subdivision (g) of section 301 as it now reads provides that if a soldier is killed in the service or dies from disease in the service and leaves a widowed mother, that she shall receive $20, with the limitation, however, that the amount payable under this subdivision shall not be greater than a sum which, when added to the total amount payable to the soldier's widow and children, does not exceed $75. Now, the amendment to this subdivision (g) of section 301 proposed in this act, which we are now considering, strikes out the language "widowed mother" and permits this allowance to be paid either to a dependent mother or a dependent father, or $30 to both, and I think that the change is one that should be made, and I entirely approve. But the section does contain another new provision which I do not think should remain, and I believe my colleague from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], who has charge of the bill, will agree with me that the provision to which I refer should be eliminated. It reads as follows:

But no compensation shall be payable if the dependency arises more than five years after the death of the person.

Now, I take it that that would be an unwise provision for us to enact at this time and is one which I believe will certainly be repealed at some time in the future, if we do enact it. Now, why do I say that? Here is a widowed mother, we will say. She has only one boy, and that boy is now fighting with the American forces at the front in France. The boy is killed fighting the battles of democracy and for the rights and liberties of our country. Under the language of subdivision (g) as we are now considering it there would be no pension paid to this widowed mother unless she was dependent upon her son for support. I think that is all right. I have no criticism of that. She would not be in need of the compensation if she was not dependent. But suppose that 10 years after her boy's death the mother becomes destitute. Her material possessions are swept away by misfortune. Under the language that is now proposed she could not get a dollar in the world, because more than five years would have elapsed since the death of her son, and the Congress would either enact a private pension bill on behalf of that widow or else——

Mr. IGOE. If the gentleman will permit me, I would suggest to the gentleman that in the original act we specifically said this would be payable whenever her condition is such that if her son were living the widowed mother would have been dependent upon him for support. That is the express provision of the act.

Mr. BLACK. Yes; but the bill we are now considering changes that, and therefore I have offered my amendment, which strikes out the language in the bill that says that no compensation shall be payable if the dependency arises more than five years after the death of the person. Now, unless some one wishes to ask me a question, I do not care to take up any further time, because I think I have sufficiently explained the purpose and intent of my amendment and why it should be adopted.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman strikes out the latter part of lines 4, 5, and 6?

Mr. BLACK. The limitation.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not care.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I now have the amendment I would like to offer to section 10, which was passed some time ago. Suppose we return to it now before going any further.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 3, after the word "misconduct," insert:

"Provided, That where the words 'in the line of duty' are stricken out of section 300 of this act it shall be construed as in effect October 6, 1917."

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, the only effect of that amendment is to make it retroactive. As contained in the original act all persons covered by this section are given the right of recovery for injury received up until the time of the original act——

Mr. ESCH. What is the language used by the gentleman making it retroactive?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman, Is this to complete the section which was passed a moment ago?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes; this is to complete section 10 of this act by adding, after line 3, on page 19, at the end of the section.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. ESCH. I would suggest to the gentleman to use the language that was used in the amendment I have just recently offered and which was adopted, namely, "shall be deemed to be in effect as of."

Mr. ROBBINS. If you put the word "deemed" in, it is practically the same as the other, but, of course, the punctuation has to be changed and a semicolon has to be placed in there instead of a period.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. May I inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he could not arrive by some other language of achieving his purpose of making this provision retroactive than to refer to it in such an unusual way as by saying that where the words "in the line of duty" are stricken out it shall be construed to be in effect as of such and such a date? Would not the gentleman be willing to allow this paragraph to be passed over for further consideration?

Mr. ROBBINS. All right. The only change in paragraph 300, as it is reenacted, is to omit those words "in the line of duty." It reads:

SEC. 300. That for death or disability resulting from personal injury suffered or disease contracted by any commissioned officer or enlisted man or by any member of the Army Nurse Corps (female) or of the Navy Nurse Corps (female) when employed in active service under the War Department or Navy Department, the United States shall pay compensation as hereinafter provided; but no compensation shall be paid if the injury or disease has been caused by his own willful misconduct.

Now, the purpose of this amendment is to provide, where the injury occurs and not "in the line of duty," because it is not required to be "in the line of duty" now—it is made more general, it is not restricted—that the injury shall be compensated for as of the date of the original act, to wit, the 6th of October, 1917. The only purpose of the enactment of this section is to enlarge its provision, not to restrict it to "the line of duty," but to enlarge the right to recover for an injury received in any way, and therefore we have simply added a retroactive provision at the suggestion of the chairman of the committee. We worked it out together—I claim no authorship for myself—that where the injury has occurred under this provision so that it is covered by this section that it shall be as of the date of the approval of the original act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not state it in more usual phrase?

Mr. RAYBURN. Let me make this suggestion. I realize this is very rough, and that this bill is going to conference, and we will try to straighten it out.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not even wish to have the House conferees suffer, perhaps, the humiliation in conference or in another body of having it held up to ridicule. I think the end can be attained in much different language, and which would make it less objectionable.

Mr. SIMS. Let me ask this question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if it would not cover the purpose and effect the same purpose, without using that language of "line of duty," just by saying "this amendment shall be deemed to take effect as of October 6, 1917"? Would not that cover it all?

Mr. ROBBINS. Let it pass over for a moment and I will redraw the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That section 313 of said act is hereby repealed.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAYBURN: Strike out lines 13 and 14 of section 17, page 23, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 313 is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 313. (1) That if an injury or death for which compensation is payable under this article is caused under circumstances creating a legal liability upon some person other than the United States or the enemy to pay damages therefor, the director, as a condition to payment of compensation by the United States, may require the beneficiary to assign to the United States any right of action he may have to enforce such liability of such other person, or if it appears to be for the best interests of the beneficiary the director may require him to prosecute the said action in his own name, subject to regulations. The director may require such assignment or prosecution at any time after the injury or death, and the failure on the part of the beneficiary to so assign or to prosecute said cause of action in his own name within a reasonable time, to be fixed by the director, shall bar any right to compensation on account of the same injury or death. The cause of action so assigned to the United States may be prosecuted or compromised by the director, and any money realized or collected thereon, less the reasonable expenses of such realization or collection, shall be placed to the credit of the military and naval compensation appropriations. If the amount placed to the credit of such appropriation in such case is in excess of the amount of the award of compensation, if any, such excess shall be paid to the beneficiary after any compensation award for the same injury or death is made.

"'If a beneficiary or conditional beneficiary shall have recovered, as a result of a suit brought by him or on his behalf, or as a result of a settlement made by him or on his behalf, any money or other property in satisfaction of the liability of such other person, such money or other property so recovered shall be credited upon any compensation payable or which may become payable to such beneficiary or conditional beneficiary by the United States on account of the same injury or death.

"'(2) If an injury or death for which compensation may be payable under this article is caused under circumstances creating a legal liability upon some person to pay damages therefor, then, in order to preserve the right of action, the director may require the conditional beneficiary, at any time after the injury or death, to assign such right of action to the United States; or if it appears to be for the best interests of such conditional beneficiary to prosecute the said cause of action in his own name, subject to regulations. The failure on the part of the beneficiary to so assign or to prosecute the said cause of action in his own name within a reasonable time, to be fixed by the director, shall bar any right to compensation on account of the same injury or death. The cause of action so assigned may be prosecuted or compromised by the director, and any money realized or collected thereon, less the reasonable expenses of such realization or collection, shall be paid to such beneficiary, and be credited upon any future compensation which may become payable to such beneficiary by the United States on account of the same injury or death.

"'(3) The bureau shall make all necessary regulations for carrying out the purposes of this section. For the purposes of computation only under this section, the total amount of compensation due any beneficiary shall be deemed to be equivalent to a lump sum equal to the present value of all future payments of compensation computed as of the date of the award of compensation at 4 per cent true discount, compounded annually. The probability of the beneficiary's death before the expiration of the period during which he is entitled to compensation shall be determined according to the American experience table of mortality.

"'A conditional beneficiary is any person who may become entitled to compensation under this article on or after the death of the injured person

"'Nothing in this section to be construed to impose any administrative duties upon the War or Navy Departments.'"

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, is this practically identical with the bill as originally offered?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; except that proviso there that nothing here shall impose any additional administrative duties upon the War and Navy Departments.

Mr. ESCH. Does it also make it permissive or mandatory? You know the original section, 313, was mandatory, inasmuch as it required the beneficiary to sign. You have made that permissive?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes. We have substituted the word "may" for the word "shall."

Mr. ESCH. And the rest is practically as originally reported?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. This amendment, as I caught the reading of it, was to require the beneficiary to assign a policy of insurance the soldier might have carried. It did not seem to me to apply only to obligations other than contractual obligations. In other words, I had in my mind that the author of the provision expected it to cover damage suits for injuries resulting in the death of the soldier. But it seems to me with this language it is so broad it covers even contractual undertakings.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not think so.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Hearing it read hastily, I could not analyze it, of course.

Mr. RAYBURN. As I said awhile ago, we struck out section 313 of the original act, with only the regulation as to the Army and Navy. This would put upon them a lot of administrative duties while the war was going on.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. What class of claims would it transfer to the Government?

Mr. RAYBURN. Only personal claims.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Does the amendment so specify?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think so.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I did not so understand it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes. I will say to the gentleman that I am not so familiar with this amendment, inasmuch as it was handed to me only yesterday.

Mr. STAFFORD. This provision in its extent is almost a separate bill by itself. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he does not purpose by this amendment to have a right of action against corporations also transferred to the Government if the person injured has a claim against that corporation?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The language is limited to "person." Unless by the general construing clause of the statute "person" is construed to include "corporations," corporations would be excluded. Permit me to direct the gentleman's attention to the word "person," in the third line of the amendment. It says:

That if an injury or death for which compensation is payable under this article is caused under circumstances creating a legal liability upon some person other than the United States.

Mr. ROBBINS. I want to ask the gentleman a question. Suppose a soldier was going home on a furlough and was injured in a railroad wreck, and had the right to recover for that injury $25,000, and he had an insurance policy, what shape would he be in? Would the Government be entitled, in case of his death, to be recompensed to the extent of the recovery if he was injured or if death occurred? Would the Government be entitled to be recompensed to the full extent of the insurance policy?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think it is the purpose of the mover of this amendment to have the Government subrogated to the rights of the beneficiary, but the question is how far the Government should be subrogated to the rights of the beneficiary. Suppose the injured soldier would have an insurance policy of $1,000, would you go to the extent of depriving the heirs of the right to recover $24,000 just because the beneficiary had taken out an insurance policy of $1,000?

Mr. RAYBURN. It would not prevent a recovery.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the intention was not to try to get to a conclusion of this bill to-night, this should be allowed to go over until the next meeting. We are legislating on a subject that was not covered by the bill and not even suggested in the report of the committee. Yet it is of such large extent that the committee ought to have some time to consider such a broad subject.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Does not that language concerning compensation for personal injury cover claims due under an accident policy?

Mr. STAFFORD. On the spur of the moment I would be inclined to believe it would.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. He would have to assign his accident policy to the Government.

Mr. SIMS. It provides only for compensation.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Compensation for personal injuries?

Mr. RAYBURN. No. We are talking about the compensation under this war-risk insurance act. That is what he would have to assign. Where he brought suit against the Government and recovered more than that amounted to, that much of it would be subtracted from the lump sum.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I can not help reaching the conclusion that this amendment is intended to subrogate the Government to the rights of the soldier against anybody who might injure him.

Mr. SIMS. For which he would be liable to the soldier?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes. The accident insurance company would be liable for the personal injury, although they did not personally injure him. I think it would be dangerous to put such language in the act as would require the soldier to turn over his insurance policy that he had been carrying for years, perhaps.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would the gentleman from Texas be willing to pass this by?

Mr. SIMS. I suggest that we amend by putting in a provision similar to that applying to the Army and Navy.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman agree to pass it over temporarily until we get to the end of the bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we pass over this amendment temporarily. I withdraw it temporarily.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment temporarily. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] desire recognition?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes. I have sent an amendment up to the desk. I ask unanimous consent that we return to section 10 for the purpose of adding an amendment at the end thereof, which I have sent to the desk and which I ask the Clerk to read. It goes in on page 19, line 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ROBBINS: Page 19, line 3, after the word "misconduct," insert "Provided, That this section as amended shall be deemed to become effective as of the 6th day of October, 1917."

Mr. ROBBINS. That is the language we adopted in making the other sections retroactive.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That section 401 of said act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 401. That such insurance must be applied for within 120 days after enlistment or after entrance into or employment in the active service and before discharge or resignation, except that those persons who are in the active war service at the time of the publication of the terms and conditions of such contract of insurance may apply at any time within 120 days thereafter and while in such service. Any person in the active service on or after the 6th day of April, 1917, who, while in such service and before the expiration of 120 days from and after such publication, becomes or has become totally and permanently disabled or dies, or has died, without having applied for insurance, shall be deemed to have applied for and to have been granted insurance payable to such person during his life in monthly installments of $25 each. If he shall die either before he shall have received any of such monthly installments or before he shall have received 240 of such monthly installments, then $25 per month shall be paid to his widow from the time of his death and during her widowhood, or if there is no widow surviving him, then to his child or children, or if there is no child surviving him, then to his mother, or if there is no mother surviving him, then to his father, if and while they survive him: Provided, however, That not more than 240 of such monthly installments, including those received by such person during his total and permanent disability, shall be so paid. The amount of the monthly installments shall be apportioned between children as may be provided by regulations."

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SWITZER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], the chairman of the committee, as to the administration of this section, providing he can give the information. I notice that the dispatches from France show a great many men missing. What will be the effect upon the insurance of those soldiers if those men are merely reported as missing, in the administration? Will their pay go on and the premiums be kept up, or will they be held as deceased, or what will be the holding?

Mr. RAYBURN. The only thing that the bureau has to act upon is this: When the War Department certifies to them that a certain list of soldiers have been killed or died, then action can be taken. They do not act until they have that fact certified to them by the War Department.

Mr. SWITZER. Supposing a soldier was captured by the German Army or by any other army that we are fighting and it would be six months or a year before we found out where he is. What becomes of his insurance?

Mr. RAYBURN. As I explained a while ago, the department does not inquire where the premiums come from. If he has made arrangements and has asked that enough of his pay be held to cover his insurance, of course they would continue to hold it, and if somebody else was paying it, they would continue to do so. It would be accumulating for him; certainly it would not be taken away from him.

Mr. SWITZER. The insurance would not lapse?

Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, no.

Mr. ROBBINS. I want to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill a question. I do not see any provision in this act for giving notice before the insurance is permitted to lapse. In all other insurance policies notice is always given to the insured or the beneficiary before there is a lapse. It seems to me we ought to put a provision in this bill that if a man is captured in the foreign service, in the military service of his country, before the policy of insurance should be permitted to lapse there should be notice given to the beneficiary that is named in the policy. It would be a great hardship if a man was captured and held a prisoner for a year, say, for illustration—and that will undoubtedly occur in this war—that the policy of insurance should be allowed to lapse because the premium is not paid. The policy, of course, ought to lapse under certain conditions if the premium is not paid; but it would not be fair at all to allow it to lapse if a man were held in prison or in a prison camp or hospital. I think notice should be given to the bureau by the War Department and through the mail or otherwise to the beneficiary.

I am merely submitting now to the gentleman in charge of this bill a hasty impression that I have obtained from the reading of the section, that there ought to be some provision somewhere in this bill to prevent the lapsing of these policies without due notice to those who are beneficiaries—the father or mother or other survivors—who are entitled to the benefit of the policy in case of death. If they can not pay the soldier, and his pay has accumulated in the hands of the Pay Department of the Army, then this ought to be applied—so long as there is not definite information to the effect that the soldier had been killed—to payment of premiums, so the policy would not lapse. Of course then the policy would ripen. But there are cases—and there are going to be cases in this war, Mr. Chairman—where the soldier will be captured and held in captivity without any record either that they are dead or as to what has become of them. These are the men who should be the objects of our most solicitous care and concern.

I think there ought to be some provision in the bill to remedy the occurring of such untoward events. We are more anxious to get the bill right than we are to pass it to-night.

Mr. SWITZER. Why would not it be safer to say that his pay shall continue, or so much as is necessary to pay the premium, which shall be applied to the payment of the premium to prevent the lapse of the policy during the time he is marked absent?

Mr. ROBBINS. There ought to be a provision in the bill, Mr. Chairman, that no policy of insurance should lapse for a soldier, by reason of his absence or from the fact that his presence is not known, so long as his pay is accumulating in the Pay Department of the Army, because he may be captured and have no means of communicating with the department. It may not be known where he is. He is placed in that position because he is in the military service of his country. As soon as information reaches the proper officers that he is killed, then, of course, the provisions of the policy become operative and his beneficiaries are entitled to the benefits under the policy. But what of the two years that he might be held in captivity in Germany and the authorities know nothing about him? It would be unfair to say that because the premium is not regularly paid the policy shall lapse. We ought not to pass an act like that. It would be a gross injustice in legislation and a hardship on the man serving in the Army. It would be doing the very thing that we do not want to do and defeat the purposes of the act. I appeal to the committee that it is more important to get this bill right than it is that we pass it to-day, and therefore I appeal to the chairman of the committee in charge of this legislation that if there is any doubt about this contingency being fully guarded against that we pass the bill over for the present until we get this section correct in form and in substance.

Mr. RAYBURN. I will say I do not think there is any doubt about this; the policy will not lapse because the man happens to be captured. I can not conceive of such a thing. He has made arrangements in one of two ways, either to pay it himself and have it held out of his pay, or some one else has agreed to pay it for him. Why it should lapse because he is in prison I can not conceive.

Mr. ROBBINS. What would become of the man who had the insurance policy who had ordered that monthly deduction only be made and he is captured?

Mr. RAYBURN. They do not do that kind of business. He would give a general order to hold so much money out of his month's salary. The orders never would come to him to sign.

Mr. ROBBINS. If the chairman of the committee, who has given this matter careful attention, assures me, as he now does, that the bill is proper, and that no hardship will be by it imposed on the soldier or his beneficiaries under the policy I shall not oppose the passage of the act now.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 19. That section 18 of this act amending the automatic insurance provisions of section 401 of the act approved September 2, 1914, as amended, shall be deemed to be in effect as of October 6, 1917: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to interfere with the payment of monthly installments, authorized to be made under the provisions of said section 401 as originally enacted, for the months up to and including June, 1918: Provided further, That all awards of automatic insurance under the provisions of such section 401 as originally enacted shall be revised as of the 1st day of July, 1918, in accordance with the provisions of said section 401 as amended by section 17 of this act.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, on line 11, page 25, I move to amend by striking out the word "seventeen" and inserting "eighteen." That was an error.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the amendment to section 17 that I withdrew.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 13 and 14 of section 17, on page 23, and insert the following:

"Section 313 of said act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'That if an injury or death for which compensation is payable under this amendatory act is caused under circumstances creating a legal liability upon some person other than the United States or the enemy to pay damages therefor, the director, as a condition to payment of compensation by the United States, may require the beneficiary to assign to the United States any right of action he may have to enforce such liability of such other person or any right which he may have to share in any money or other property received in satisfaction of such liability of such other person. The cause of action so assigned to the United States may be prosecuted or compromised by the director, and any money realized thereon shall be placed to the credit of the compensation fund. Nothing in this section to be construed to impose any administrative duties upon the War or Navy Departments.'"

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas a question. On page 26 is the following provision:

If no such person survive the insured, then there shall be paid to the estate of the insured an amount equal to the reserve value, if any, of the insurance at the time of his death—

And so forth.

What is meant by the reserve value?

Mr. RAYBURN. That would be the cash-surrender value of the policy. Nearly every insurance policy has a cash-surrender value.

Mr. LONDON. It means the cash-surrender value?

Mr. RAYBURN. That was the explanation by those who claim to know.

Mr. LONDON. I was puzzled by the expression.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SIMS: Page 27, after line 4, insert:

"SEC. 21. That section 406 of said act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 406. Whenever the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury that a person who is not in the military or naval forces of the United States is actively engaged in rendering services auxiliary to the conduct of the war, or is about to engage in such services, and after a medical examination it shall be established to the satisfaction of the director that such person is a proper insurable risk at normal premium rates, and it shall further appear to his satisfaction that by reason of the place at which services are to be rendered, or the nature of such services, such person is unable to procure from private insurers insurance against death or permanent total disability at the normal rates for persons in nonhazardous occupations, the director, subject to the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury and to such regulations or limitations as he may prescribe, may grant to such person insurance at the same rates and subject to the same conditions as are provided in this article for insurance granted to persons in the military and naval service of the United States: Provided, That such insurance shall become effective only when such person shall have entered upon such service, or shall have embarked upon the high seas for the purpose of entering thereon, and only if he or she shall have entered thereon or thus embarked within such time after such medical examination as the Secretary of the Treasury shall have prescribed: Provided further, That in the discretion of the director such insurance in any case may be canceled at any time after the termination of such service.'"

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. SIMS. Will not the gentleman reserve the point of order long enough to have a letter read which I received from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I understood it was the purpose of the gentleman, and I was accommodating him and other members of the committee were accommodating the gentleman, to finish this bill to-day. Here is an extraneous provision which is now offered, which has never been considered, I am informed, by the committee, and I ask the gentleman in all candor whether he is not imposing upon the committee by offering this amendment which is not germane?

Mr. SIMS. If the point of order is made and it is sustained——

Mr. STAFFORD. I make the point of order that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee confess the point of order is well taken?

Mr. SIMS. According to the way the Chair held on another amendment I am very much afraid, unless I could persuade the Chair otherwise, that he would apply the same ruling to this amendment. I have offered the amendment in good faith and would like to have the letter of the Assistant Secretary read in connection with it before the point of order is acted upon.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection to having the letter inserted in the RECORD, but as it is now after half past 5 o'clock——

Mr. CANNON. Have it printed by unanimous consent.

Mr. SIMS. Then the gentleman will not reserve the point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think I am accommodating the membership of the House by pressing the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, for the reasons stated in respect to the other amendment.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the RECORD at this point. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 17, 1918.

Hon. THETUS W. SIMS,
Chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SIMS: In view of our conversation of yesterday and in compliance with your request, I am writing you with reference to the suggested amendment to the war-risk insurance act providing for the insurance of persons engaged in auxiliary war service.

The desirability of such legislation arises from the fact that Red Cross nurses and canteen workers and other Red Cross workers, Young Men's Christian Association, Knights of Columbus, the Jewish Welfare Board, members of the Russian Railway Service Corps of Engineers, Army field clerks, as well as numerous clerks employed in the Treasury Department, are required to perform necessary and indispensable war service in France, many of them under conditions little less hazardous than those surrounding military service.

It is impossible for any of these persons to obtain insurance protection for their families except at prohibitive rates.

Under the law, if the proposed amendment is adopted, these persons, if certified by the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy as being engaged in auxiliary war service, may apply for and obtain insurance upon condition that they pass a proper medical examination showing that they are in insurable physical condition, and the amendment is so drawn that by regulation all proper safeguards to prevent abuses may be provided.

There have been numerous requests from Senators and Congressmen and from representatives of all of the classes of persons engaged in auxiliary war service above referred to for such an amendment, and the Treasury Department believes it to be in every way proper and desirable.

Sincerely, yours,

THOS. H. LOVE, Assistant Secretary.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the period, at the end of line 4, page 27, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"That section 203 of said act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'That in case one-half of an enlisted man's monthly pay is not allotted, regulations, to be made by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, respectively, may require, under circumstances and conditions as may be prescribed in such resolutions, that any proportion of said one-half pay that is not allotted shall be deposited to his credit, to be held during such period of his service as may be prescribed. Such deposits shall bear interest at the same rate as United States bonds bear for the same period, and, when payable, shall be paid, principal and interest, to the enlisted man, if living; otherwise to any beneficiary or beneficiaries whom he may have designated, or, if there be no such beneficiary, then to the person or persons who under the laws of the State of his residence would be entitled to his personal property.'"

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I will briefly state to the committee that the purpose of this amendment is to change the rate of interest from 4 per cent and give the soldier who lends his money to the United States 4¼ per cent, or 5 per cent, or whatever the rate may be of the bonds of the United States at the period his money is withheld; that his money shall bear the same rate of interest that the Government bonds issued to carry on the war bear. If the soldier fights our battles and lends half his money to the Government, he ought to have the same rate of interest that we get who buy the bonds of the United States.

Mr. ROBBINS. It is fixed in the paragraph, as I understand it, in the original law that such deposits shall bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent.

Mr. McKEOWN. I have left that out and inserted a provision that it shall bear the interest that the bonds of the United States bear during the same period of time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would some of these deposits that were made subsequent to the issue of the first liberty loan bear only 3½ per cent?

Mr. McKEOWN. No. None of them would bear less than 4 per cent.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is aware that the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance is endeavoring in every way to get rid of administrative details. They are complaining, for instance, in respect to a bill reported by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], that they want to have one certain rate to be paid to the soldiers in allotments. I do not think on the spur of the moment we should consider this amendment. I am rather in sympathy with it, but I do not think we ought to incorporate it in the bill. The amending stage of this bill relating to section 203 is past. I think it would have been in order at that time, though there is nothing in the bill reported by the committee amending section 203. Under the decisions of the House, it is not germane at the present place in the bill and is, therefore, subject to the point of order.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's point of order is not well taken. This is a bill to amend an act. That there is no provision amending section 203 is true, but the gentleman's point of order is not well taken. The amendment is germane to this bill. Of course, I am not as familiar with the rules of the House as the gentleman from Wisconsin——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I say there is some question. I am frank to say I do not wish to take advantage of any Member by any technicality on a point of order, but there are rulings to the effect that if there is a portion of the bill where an amendment could be in order it should have been offered at that time. There are portions of the bill where it would have been in order to have offered this amendment. For instance, there is section 200, section 206, and——

Mr. McKEOWN. But this is offered as a new section.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, every amendment to an appropriation bill could be offered as a new section. The question is whether it is germane at this place in the bill, and that is the point of order I make.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill we have under consideration is simply an amendment of the original war-risk insurance act and it does seem to the Chair that this amendment is in order and germane to the subject. Therefore, the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. ROBBINS. I desire to ask the gentleman one question. Does the gentleman's amendment simply provide that instead of the rate of interest being fixed arbitrarily at 4 per cent it shall conform to the current rate of interest on Government bonds?

Mr. McKEOWN. As the rate progresses; yes, sir.

Mr. ROBBINS. It will be 4¼ per cent now instead of 4 per cent.

Mr. McKEOWN. Four and one-quarter per cent instead of 4 per cent; they will have the advantage of that rate after that period.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOOHER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, stated that that committee having had under consideration the bill S. 4482, had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the amended Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, it is in this shape: The Senate bill is now amended, and this is to pass the Senate bill as amended?

The SPEAKER. Why, of course.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. RAYBURN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bills H. R. 11520 and H. R. 12037, being the two bills which were consolidated in this amended Senate bill, be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bills will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Tennessee going to call up another bill?

Mr. SIMS. I am going to call one up, but I shall not insist upon its being acted upon now.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 41 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 23, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of Labor submitting a deficiency estimate of appropriation required to provide housing, local transportation, and other community utilities for war needs (H. Doc. No. 1116); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting copy of a communication from the Chief of Engineers submitting a proposed clause of legislation for inclusion in the pending Army appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1117); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting deficiency estimates of appropriation required by the General Land Office for resurveys in the State of Colorado and for classification of lands involved in the Oregon & California Railroad forfeiture suit (H. Doc. No. 1118); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the Secretary of the Navy submitting additional estimates of appropriations required by the Civil and Naval Establishments of the Navy Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918 (H. Doc. No. 1119); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation, for six clerks of class 1, needed to bring up the arrears of work in the Returns Office of the Interior Department for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1120); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

6. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Ordnance Department of the Army for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1121); so much as relates to appropriation, referred to the Committee on Appropriations; so much as refers to authorizations, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

7. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of channel to Port Bolivar, Tex., with a view to enlargement, extension, and protection of the turning basin (H. Doc. No. 1122); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

8. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting a proposed paragraph of legislation for inclusion in the general or other deficiency bill (H. Doc. No. 1123); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. CARLIN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10240) to incorporate the Recreation Association of America, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 594), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 23, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, how excellent is Thy name in all the earth. The wrath of man has not taken from the glory of Thy name or from Thy power in the earth. Thou art the author and the lover of freedom. Thou dost relate us to Thyself and Thou dost call us to preserve the rights that Thou hast committed unto men. Thou hast left in large measure the government of the world in the hands of men who love freedom. We bless Thee that as we move forward we go with a clear conscience and with a conviction that Thou art leading the hosts of those who love the rights of men. We pray Thee to guide us and preserve us for the conflict. Direct our hearts and minds to keep Thy law and give us the victory. In Thy name we ask it. For Jesus' sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SMITH of Michigan and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 152) to prevent rent profiteering in the District of Columbia, disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Mr. CROSSER, and Mr. CARY managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10069) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SMALL, Mr. BOOHER, and Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 4482) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 11048) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended by the act approved June 12, 1917, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a petition of the Presbyterian Ministers' Association of Washington, D. C., and a petition of the congregation of the Metropolitan Presbyterian Church, of Washington, D. C., praying for the enactment of a Sunday rest law for the District of Columbia, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I have a memorial from the Trades and Labor Council of Battle Creek, Mich., asking Congress to reconsider the so-called zone system of postal increase. I realize that, as this legislation affects the revenues of the Government, any bill intended to change or alter the legislation must, under the Constitution, originate in the House of Representatives. Yet this memorial is of sufficient importance to warrant me in asking that it may be read for the information of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read the memorial, as follows:

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., May 12, 1918.

Whereas the Congress of the United States in the enactment of the war-revenue law has placed an unwarranted tax on all publications, and particularly on second-class publications, such as newspapers and magazines, by means of an increased postage rate and the application of the "zone" system; and

Whereas the enforcement of this system of postal rates on second-class matter will destroy thousands of newspapers (farm, medical, religious, agriculture, and labor papers), throwing thousands of men and women out of employment; and

Whereas the public press is the great source of education, information, and recreation to millions of people, and their only communication with the outside world; and

Whereas the labor press is most essential to the millions of workers at this particular time on account of the educational advantages derived therefrom: Therefore be it

Resolved, That in the opinion of this council the second-class postage rates should not have been changed; that the system of rates provided are not a legitimate war tax, and that they will destroy a valuable industry from which the Government seeks revenue; that the system will unwisely curtail the publications of our country; and be it further

Resolved, That Congress be urged to amend the existing war-revenue law by eliminating that section dealing with second-class postage, and that this subject be then dealt with by Congress as a separate and distinct matter viewed from the stand of service rather than for war revenue; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the Senators and Representatives in Washington, D. C., from our State and one to the governor.

BATTLE CREEK TRADES AND LABOR COUNCIL,
W. H. GILBERT, President.
D. J. ULDRIKS, Vice President.
[SEAL.] Mrs. GOLDIE M. SPENCER,
Secretary-Treasurer.

Mr. McLEAN. I have a brief resolution adopted by the Connecticut State Council of Defense, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas conditions in Europe indicate that the war will call for greater efforts and will be more prolonged than was assumed to be the case when existing arrangements for the creation of our armed forces were made: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this council urges upon the Government the necessity of now basing all plans for the enlistment of men, the manufacture of arms and munitions, and the building of ships upon a minimum of 5,000,000 fighting men, which will make necessary auxiliary forces to the extent of several million in addition.

Resolved further, In order to distribute the burden of providing such forces more equitably and to make it more easy to secure them, having in view the principle of selection for the various kinds of duty which must be performed, in the opinion of this council the upper limit of the draft age should be raised to 45 years.

Resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the President, to the Secretary of War, to the Secretary of the Navy, to the Provost Marshal General, and to the Connecticut Senators and all Connecticut Congressmen.

CONNECTICUT STATE COUNCIL OF DEFENSE,
RICHARD M. BISSELL, Chairman.

Approved:

MARCUS HOLCOMB, Governor.

HARTFORD, CONN., May 20, 1918.

Mr. McLEAN presented a memorial of the Clearing House Association of Hartford, Conn., remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill 4426, providing for a guaranty fund for certain bank deposits, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Torrington, Clinton, Pomfret, Manchester, and South Manchester, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Grand Division, Sons of Temperance of Connecticut, of Hartford, Conn., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. THOMPSON presented a petition of the Central States Osteopathic Association, of Kansas City, Mo., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for the commissioning of osteopaths in the medical department of the Army, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the executive board of the Kansas State Federation of Labor, of Wichita, Kans., and a petition of the Central Labor Union, of Coffeyville, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for the reeducation and rehabilitation of crippled soldiers and sailors, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MYERS presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Glasgow, Mont., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for the adequate construction of highways and to place the administration of same in the hands of a centralized Federal board, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 4467) to validate the homestead entry of the heirs of Victoria A. Thomson (Rept. No. 464); and

A bill (S. 4541) for the relief of Lynette Dean Maxwell, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 461).

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9898) to establish in the Coast Artillery Corps of the Regular Army an Army mine-planter service, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 463) thereon.

Mr. WEEKS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3260) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Wilbur F. Lawton, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the bill (S. 3986) to acquire the manuscript of Charles Chaillé-Long, containing an account of the unveiling of the McClellan statue, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 462) thereon.

PUBLIC LAND IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. KELLOGG. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 4554) for the sale of isolated tracts of the public domain in Minnesota, and I submit a report (No. 459) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act of March 28, 1912 (37 Stat. L., p. 77), relating to the sale of isolated tracts of the public domain, be, and the same are hereby, extended and made applicable to ceded Chippewa Indian lands in the State of Minnesota: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to lands which are not subject to homestead entry: Provided further, That purchasers of land under this act must pay for the lands not less than the price fixed in the law opening the lands to homestead entry.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator state briefly the purpose of the bill?

Mr. KELLOGG. The bill is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior. It simply applies the general statutes to lands authorized to be sold in the Chippewa Reservation.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. KELLOGG. I also report back favorably, without amendment, from the Committee on Public Lands the bill (S. 4555) to validate certain public-land entries and I submit a report (No. 460) thereon. It is a bill to validate some 14 homestead entries in the State of Minnesota. It is also recommended by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator state that it is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. KELLOGG. The Secretary states in a communication of some length, which accompanies the bill, that at the time these entries were made it was supposed in the Land Office that the entrymen were qualified to make the entries. After they had made the entries and some of them had paid the full consideration and others partly performed it was found that they were not qualified. The Secretary of the Interior recommends that they be qualified by act of Congress. He made this recommendation to the House, and the House committee unanimously recommended the bill for passage. He made also the same recommendation to this committee, and this committee has recommended it. There are only 13 or 14 entries altogether to be validated.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all entries heretofore erroneously allowed for lands opened to entry under the act approved February 20, 1904 (33 Stat. L., p. 46), and the act of February 16, 1911 (36 Stat. L., p. 913), to persons who had previously exhausted their homestead rights, are hereby ratified and confirmed; and any such entry which has been canceled for the reason given shall be reinstated in the absence of conflicts and proceed to patent upon compliance with the law under which the entry was made.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (by request):

A bill (S. 4590) amending section 2 of an act entitled "An act to pension the survivors of certain Indian wars from January 1, 1859, to January, 1891, inclusive, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SIMMONS:

A bill (S. 4591) for the relief of John G. Young; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SHERMAN:

A bill (S. 4592) granting an increase of pension to James S. McDonald; and

A bill (S. 4593) granting a pension to Martha J. Davis; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 4594) to provide for the sale of isolated tracts of enlarged homestead land; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 4595) to provide for the award of medals of honor, distinguished-service crosses and distinguished-service medals, and for other purposes (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 4596) granting an increase of pension to Allen T. Landress; to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 4597) extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River at or near the city of Fairmont, W. Va.; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. UNDERWOOD:

A bill (S. 4598) further extending the time for the commencement and completion of the bridge or bridges authorized by an act entitled "An act to amend an act to authorize the Dauphin Island Railway & Harbor Co., its successors or assigns, to construct and maintain a bridge or bridges, or viaducts across the water between the mainland at or near Cedar Point, and Dauphin Island, both little and big; also to dredge a channel from the deep waters of Mobile Bay into Dauphin Bay; also to construct and maintain docks and wharves along both Little and Big Dauphin Island," approved June 18, 1912, as extended by an act approved June 30, 1916; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. SIMMONS:

A bill (S. 4599) for the relief of Cleveland L. Short; to the Committee on Claims.

COMPENSATION OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE CARRIERS.

Mr. CUMMINS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 247), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Director General of Railroads furnish to the Senate, for the use of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, a copy of the agreement between the United States and each carrier, heretofore or hereafter made, for just compensation under section 1 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918; also the names of the carriers, if any, which have refused or failed to enter into an agreement for such just compensation; also the names of the carriers whose systems, roads, or facilities are now in the possession of the United States or are used, controlled, or operated by the United States under the laws thereof.

SHORT-LINE RAILROADS.

Mr. OVERMAN. By unanimous consent I ask the Secretary to read into the RECORD a letter I have received from Judge Payne, of the United States Railroad Administration, which I am satisfied will be of great interest to every Senator who has a short-line railroad in his State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNITED STATES RAILROAD ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, May 18, 1918.

DEAR SENATOR OVERMAN: Apropos of your discussion of the Carolina & Yadkin River Railway:

I beg to call your attention to the very great difficulties which the Railroad Administration confronts with reference to the short-line roads. You know, of course, that many people believe that the Government should take these roads and operate them. Many of them are not necessary for any Government purpose, but it is a matter of profound interest that they be continued in operation, because they serve the highest needs of many local communities. What is best has given the Director General and his staff great anxiety.

I submit the following suggestions as to a solution of the problem:

(a) If the roads are taken over by the Government, there will be an immediate raise in wages of all employees in keeping with the wage adjustment which has just been made with the trunk lines, and there will be a demand for an improvement in service and an improvement in general conditions on the line, so as to bring the roads up to the standard of the trunk lines. This will be due to the fact that they are under Government control and the Government should treat everybody alike.

(b) It seems to me that the roads themselves, the communities, and the Government will be benefited if the following happens:

(1) That the Government see that the short-line roads have a fair division of the joint rates; in many cases heretofore they have not enjoyed a fair division.

(2) Also an increase in rates—this must be by the State commissions—so as to keep them on a parity with the rates on the trunk lines, which must be raised to meet existing conditions; also the Government will see that the roads are furnished, as far as possible, with an adequate supply of cars, so that they may serve the public, and that the freight shall not be so routed as to discriminate against these lines.

Please advise me whether, in your opinion, if the administration adopts such a policy as is here outlined, it will not best serve the public and the Government.

My kindest regards.

Yours, very truly, JOHN BARTON PAYNE.

Hon. LEE S. OVERMAN,
United States Senate.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives, disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10069) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. RANSDELL, and Mr. NELSON conferees on the part of the Senate.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4482) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House and request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, and Mr. SMOOT conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 11048. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended by the act approved June 12, 1917, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

NATIONAL BANKING ASSOCIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed, and the calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If there is no other business that anyone desires to bring before the Senate during the morning hour, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4557.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Committee on Banking and Currency has a bill on the calendar that we would like to bring up for consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I will yield. Senate bill 4557 is the unfinished business, and I do not wish to occupy the morning hour with it if there are other measures that Senators desire to have considered.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3898) to require cashiers and other officers of the national banking association handling its funds to give bond and to prevent its officers and employees from making erasures on the books of the association.

On a division the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all cashiers, assistant cashiers, tellers, and other officers and employees of national banking associations who handle or who have the custody or control of the funds or assets of such associations shall be required to execute bond, with good and sufficient security, in such penal sum not less than $1,000 as the board of directors shall prescribe, conditioned on the faithful performance of their respective duties and the proper accounting for all funds and assets placed in their hands or coming under their control which belong to or are in the custody of the association.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. THOMAS. The title of the bill would either indicate that this legislation is surplusage or that existing laws upon the subject are strangely deficient. I have labored under the apprehension thus far that cashiers and other responsible officers of banking institutions are under bond, and also that bookkeepers and other accountants making erasures upon the books of the association are very apt to get into trouble, and very serious trouble. If it is true that there is a hiatus in the law which relates to this very important subject, then certainly we have been at fault in our legislation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator that defects in the present law have been found by the Comptroller of the Currency. The bill was prepared by the department and sent down here for consideration. In different banks stealings have occurred by reason of permitting erasures by acid or knife, and thereby obliterating every evidence of the first figures composing the balance or the item. The object of section 2 is to require that erasures shall be made by crossing the amount out in ink and the substitution for it of the correct amount, as found by the officer, so that if any false figures have been inserted they can be easily detected. For that reason it seems to me there can be no possible objection to the bill.

Section 2 provides:

That no officer or employee shall erase or cause to be erased or removed, either by acid or abrasion, any entries on the books of an association. Where entries have been erroneously made and it is desired to correct them they shall be canceled in ink in such manner as to indicate the cancellation but leave the original entry, so that it can be read or deciphered.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I find no penal provisions in the proposed statute. Assume that there is a violation of the terms of section 2, the section just read by the Senator from Colorado, what then?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think there are some general provisions of law imposing penalties for violations of the banking laws. Anyway, under this bill, there would be a right on the part of the banks to compel either repayment or to enforce the liability upon the bond if damage resulted to the banks, and an easy way of detection would aid in that respect.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think that the Senator from Colorado is in error, if he thinks that the general statute, which is already in existence, could be extended to cover infractions of this proposed law. If this bill were projected into an existing law which carried a penal provision for the violation of the general law, then it is quite likely that the penal provisions of the general law would extend to infractions provided in this act; that is, if they were carried into the general act; but it is very clear to me that a general statute which has a penal provision could not be made applicable to this special act which postdates it in the time of its passage.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator from Utah that while there is no penal provision in the first section, there are general provisions as to the forfeiture of charters for a violation of any of the laws relating to national banks; at any rate, it does seem to me that these are good provisions, and are provisions which ought to be made a part of the method of conducting any banking business. On that account it seems to me that the measure ought to pass. I will say that it has received the unanimous approval of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the theory of this bill and of many of the others that follow it on the calendar is that there are no officers of any of the national banks of the United States who know how to run a bank; in other words, that they must be instructed as to every little detail of banking, from the opening of the bank in the morning until the closing of the bank in the evening.

The idea, Mr. President, of compelling every employee of a national banking association to take out a bond of not less than $1,000! I know employees in banks that I am interested in that I would never think of asking to furnish a bond; I would trust them with all I have on earth. Why impose upon such men the expense of furnishing a bond?

There is nothing really vicious in this bill. I think that every officer of a bank knows whether he ought to require a bond from his employees or not. I desire to say that the losses which come to national banks through the defalcation of employees are very few in number, and when they do occur a thousand dollars is not going to go very far toward paying the amount that may have been stolen.

Of course, Mr. President, section 2 of the bill may have a little merit in it, but it has very little. I do not believe that the other House is going to consider this measure or to consider many of the 18 bills which follow this one on the calendar. If, however, the Senate thinks that the time has arrived when we must have a legislative primer on banking for all of the officers of all of the national banks of the country to tell them just what they have to do, this class of legislation is a good beginning. The banks will not be seriously injured by it in any way, but there will be very little benefit come from it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. KING. Perhaps I should address my question rather to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], having the bill in charge, but I am going to state it rather as a declaration than as a question.

As I understand the national banking act, the Comptroller of the Currency now has the right to prescribe rules and regulations for the conduct of the banks, the method of keeping books, and so forth, and he would have ample authority to adopt or prescribe or promulgate regulations of the character embraced in this bill; and, in view of the fact that this carries no penal provision, those regulations would have as much binding effect as would this act itself.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if no regulations were promulgated by the Comptroller of the Currency this act would not amount to anything. There is no penalty attached to it. The only way it will ever be enforced or can be enforced, if it is ever necessary to enforce it, will be by rules and regulations. I think that every member of the committee understood that; but, of course, Mr. President, the passage of such measures as this results in merely loading up our statute books with laws that there is no reason whatever for passing.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield for a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Did the Senator state what penalty could be invoked to enforce the provisions of section 2 of this proposal?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no penalty provided for in this bill; and if it is ever enforced by the department, it will be done by some rule or regulation which may be prescribed by the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator means that the Comptroller of the Currency by some rule or regulation will prescribe a penalty?

Mr. SMOOT. He will; and I think, Mr. President, that he could do that without the passage of this bill. The passage of this bill will make no difference, so far as enforcing it upon the banks of the country is concerned.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator from Utah understand that section 2 of the bill has been proposed for the purpose of preventing frauds?

Mr. SMOOT. That is the reason it is suggested.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator means the forcing of balances by falsifying of the books of a bank?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from New York that in some cases where defalcations in banks have been committed, notice has not been called to them by reason of the persons having the book in charge erasing figures and placing other figures in their stead. Of course, if this bill passes, and a dishonest employee wanted to steal he would simply change the figures in the first place. If it is desired to steal money from a bank there are many ways in which it can be done; and this proposed legislation is not going to prevent that at all.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, there is no doubt that banks, such as those in which the Senator from Utah is the dominating figure, if there be such banks, and I have no doubt there are, require bonds of their employees, and provide that, if corrections are made in the books, the corrections shall show plainly on their face what they are. There is no doubt that the great majority of the banks in this country have such provisions, but laws are passed to take care of those who do not do business in the regular and orderly way. The provisions of this bill will be enforced by the Comptroller of the Currency as he enforces other provisions of the national-bank act. If national banks do not comply with the provisions of the law the Comptroller of the Currency can suspend or annul their charters. That is the way banks are compelled to comply with the law, and they comply rather than have their charters suspended or annulled.

The Comptroller of the Currency has found that in some cases there have been defalcations that are not covered by bonds. It is true a bond of $1,000 would not cover a $5,000 defalcation, but the fact that a man is bonded means that he is going to be watched by the man who issues the bond, and if he is living beyond his salary or "playing the races" he is going to be called to account; it means that there is an eye watching him, which will make him more careful, and he will be kept within bounds.

The Comptroller of the Currency in his four or five years' experience has found these defects in the national banking system. There has not been any general attempt to plug up the holes of the national banking system since it was inaugurated, and it was the effort of the committee, acting on the advice of the Comptroller of the Currency, to plug up these holes. The comptroller called our attention to them; the committee has voted unanimously to take action; and I believe these bills ought to be passed and that Senators really are not doing the best they can when they undertake to sneer at these corrections, which most of us believe are necessary, and delay the passage of the bills. No one can state any reason why this bill should not become a law. The members of the Banking and Currency Committee are unanimously in favor of having it become a law.

Mr. SHAFROTH. With relation to the $1,000 bond which is required to be given by the officials of a bank, of course it is not a large amount; but men vary in their views in regard to the amount that should be fixed in cases of this kind. To the big bank, of course, it is a small bond, but if we were to require a $10,000 bond some one might make the objection that as to little banks it would be outrageous to require a bond of that size. So it seemed to the committee that a thousand-dollar bond would be fair, at least, to the little banks, and could not possibly be oppressive to any banks. For that reason we thought that the bond fixed was a proper amount.

The measures reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency now on the calendar can not be, it seems to me, the subject of serious objection. They impose requirements which nearly every bank now complies with, but there are some banks that do not, and the comptroller wanted this authority, and it seems to me it ought to be given.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator a question. The Senator must know that there are banks in this country that have a blanket insurance; that is, an insurance that covers every officer and every employee of the bank, from the president down to the errand boy. If this bill is passed, will that insurance be sufficient, or under this bill will the bank have to have another insurance to cover each employee who handles the funds of the bank?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I presume that whatever requirement the Comptroller of the Currency might make would have to be complied with. If a bank wanted insurance in addition to the bond, they could take out the insurance, or they could cover the amount of the bond required in the insurance which they take out. That is the reason, as it seems to me, why the bond ought not to be very large. It ought to be about the figure that has been provided in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. The answer of the Senator goes to prove beyond question that the Comptroller of the Currency to-day has all the power to compel the banks to do just what this bill requires them to do; there is no doubt about that. If we pass this bill, it will merely put another law upon the statute books to be read, perhaps, once in a thousand years.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, at present bonds are required to be given by nearly all the officers of the Government. The banks do not seem to have any difficulty also in securing insurance by private companies against defalcations. It seems to me that the requirements of this bill would not be applicable except in cases where at least the amount of bond specified had not been already given. If that amount is given, it will satisfy the comptroller; and if a bank, for its own protection, wants a greater amount, of course it can require its cashier to give it, as he is an appointee of the bank.

As to these measures and whether they are necessary or not, who ought to know better than anybody else—the man who administers the affairs of the office itself or some person who thinks that he knows all about it, but who perhaps is not familiar with all the circumstances and all the cases that arise in the comptroller's office, and consequently does not know of the particular defects of the statute until attention is called to them by official action? When that is done, and when the responsible officer of the Government says that we need this remedy, it seems to me it ought to be provided.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us have a vote, Mr. President.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. SMOOT. On the passage of the bill I ask for a division.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator ask for the yeas and nays?

Mr. SMOOT. No; merely for a division.

On a division the bill was not passed.

PUNISHMENT FOR OBTAINING LOANS ON FALSE STATEMENTS.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business No. 333.

Mr. SMOOT. Does not the Senator mean Order of Business No. 332?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I prefer to have the Senate consider at this time Order of Business No. 333, being the bill (S. 3902) to provide a penalty for obtaining loans or credit from a national banking association based on false statements.

Mr. SMOOT. Why does not the Senator ask for the consideration of Order of Business No. 332? I wish to say to the Senator that that is about the only bill on the calendar from the Banking and Currency Committee that involves a real saving. It simply provides that a bank, after its charter expires and it is rechartered, may use the plates for the printing of its notes in the future that it used in the past. Money can be saved in that way, and I have no objection at all to that bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, Mr. President, I am not familiar with the terms of that bill, nor was I present in the committee when that bill was considered. For that reason I should like to call up the next bill in order on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well, then let the other bill be taken up.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3902) to provide a penalty for obtaining loans or credit from a national banking association based on false statements, which had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency with an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the committee will be stated.

The amendment was, on page 1, line 10, after the word "direct," to insert:

Any previous trial by a State court for defrauding an association by a false statement, willfully made, shall operate as a bar to indictment under this provision.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person, firm, or corporation applying for or obtaining a loan or credit from a national banking association on a false statement, willfully made, of the financial condition of the borrower with intent to injure or defraud such association, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not exceeding $5,000, or imprisoned not more than five years, or by both fine and imprisonment, as the court may direct. Any previous trial by a State court for defrauding an association by a false statement, willfully made, shall operate as a bar to indictment under this provision.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I should like to ask if that amendment has been agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the amendment be stated again, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is to the effect that if a man is indicted and tried under State law for an offense of this kind and is acquitted he can not be indicted under this law.

The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Colorado if the amendment which has been adopted really says what the Vice President says it means? I do not mean to be overparticular in the analysis of language, but it says:

Any previous trial by a State court for defrauding an association by a false statement, willfully made, shall operate as a bar to indictment under this provision.

Does it not mean for the same alleged offense?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It does not say so.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It should say so.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado if it is not a fact that there are statutes in every State of the Union which cover this express offense, and if this is not a mere duplication of criminal law upon the subject?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will say to the Senator that in almost all the States there are provisions of that kind; but while that is true, it was thought to be wise to make that kind of a provision part of the Federal Code with relation to national banks. We have various offenses defined as to national banks, and this is one of them; and inasmuch as it is deemed wise by the department that it should be made part of that code, it seems to me that it should not be objected to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Before we proceed further, the Chair must withdraw the opinion which the Chair expressed on the language of the amendment. The Chair supposed it had been prepared with reference to an alleged crime against the Government of the United States. It does not seem to be so prepared.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, anyone guilty of the conduct referred to in this bill, of course, ought to be convicted of a felony and sent to the penitentiary. What I have said concerning the bill was called forth by the fact that the police laws of this country are peculiarly within the control and jurisdiction of the several States, and there ought to be as little interference with them as possible.

Of course, the Congress can pass a law of this kind, although it is a police measure, because it affects a Federal function; but while all criminals ought to be punished, I have every confidence in the general assemblies and courts of the States to provide for and punish crime. There is no difficulty about punishing offenses of this kind in any State of the Union. The statutes for that purpose are rigorously enforced. I have always thought that duplicating offenses and providing for prosecutions in two different jurisdictions of the same person for the same offense was bad policy and should not be done unless in extreme cases.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, it has been deemed by the department that it is wise to place in the United States statutes a law against the making of false representations and obtaining money thereby from a national banking association, and, in order to prevent a conviction where there has been a trial in a State court upon the same subject matter, any previous trial by a State court for defrauding an association by a false statement willfully made shall operate as a bar to an indictment under this provision. I believe that the suggestion made by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is sound, and that a statement to the effect that a previous trial by a State court for the same false statement, willfully made, shall operate as a bar, should be placed in its stead.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that the usual criminal statutes found in every State in regard to obtaining money or anything of value by false and fraudulent representations would cover the act attempted to be denominated a crime in the bill under consideration?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, ordinarily that might be, but evidently there have been instances where they desired a prosecution by the Federal court; and all the laws probably not being uniform, some of the States perhaps not having such a statute, here is a provision that the authorities believe is necessary to the proper administration of the national banking laws of the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit another inquiry?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that the suggestions just made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] are wise and prudent? We have our States, with their plenary power to deal with offenses. The Supreme Court of the United States has indicated over and over again that the disposition of the Federal Government ought not to be to go into the States and enact police regulations to govern the conduct of the people with reference to their internal and local affairs.

Mr. SHAFROTH. These are not police regulations. We have any number of national banking acts of a penal nature, with penalties prescribed; and inasmuch as the law on this subject is administered very largely by the United States courts, and here is a provision that seems to have been omitted, it does seem to me that this bill ought to be passed. Offenders of this kind can be prosecuted under State laws in many States, and perhaps in some States they can not be. In any event, the law would be simply cumulative, with a provision here that a previous trial shall be a bar to prosecution in a United States court.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. The purpose of the amendment, I assume, is to prevent a man from being punished twice for the same offense. Suppose that a person is indicted in a State court and indicted in the Federal court about the same time, and he is convicted in the Federal court; that would be no bar to his prosecution and punishment in the State court. How will you provide against a case of that kind?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why, I think the constitution of the State, which prevents a man from being tried twice for the same offense, would be a bar which would be available in a State court.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not the same offense.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; it is the same offense.

Mr. CUMMINS. One is an offense against the General Government; the other is an offense against the State.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no.

Mr. CUMMINS. That very point has been ruled on a good many times, I think. Otherwise the amendment that the Senator now proposes would not be necessary. You are doing all you can to prevent the National Government from trying a man who has already been tried for the act. Now, how are you going to protect a man so far as the State court is concerned?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why, Mr. President, it does seem to me that where a state of facts exists which constitutes a crime both under the Federal statutes and under the State statutes, unquestionably it is the offense of stealing from this national bank; and inasmuch as that is the case, no matter which court gets jurisdiction, he is entitled to be tried in that court.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then the Senator's amendment is entirely unnecessary if that be a correct view of the law.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is possible that it may be, but somebody suggested that amendment, and on that account it was put in.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I would vote for this bill, among those that the Senator has presented, if the amendment which is proposed to the bill were, in my opinion, properly drawn.

I think there is another objection to the amendment in this form: It provides that in case of any previous trial in a State court the man who has been tried, and tried simply, shall be exempt from prosecution under this act. Now, of course, that trial may not have resulted in either a conviction or an acquittal. Certainly the man should have been put in jeopardy somewhere before he is exempted from the provisions of this act. I think that amendment should be radically amended, and I could not vote for it in its present form, although I will vote with the Senator for the bill if that amendment is properly drawn.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will ask the Senator to prepare the amendment in the form in which he wants it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Delaware, of course, is not engaged in that particular line of work. That is one objection that I see to the amendment. It seems to me that it should be redrawn very carefully.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado if there has been any serious difficulty in the past in punishing offenders for the crime referred to in this bill?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know. There has been none in my State. I prosecuted at one time, and I have convicted a number of people under a statute in my State which provided that false representations to a bank, by which money is obtained, are punishable. I do not know, however, how many States have those statutes, or whether the statutes are the same in all of them. I think there is some variation in them. At least, the department think that way, and I have no doubt but that they know what they are doing.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, as the president of a national bank, I ought to be in favor of any law that will deter a criminal from proceeding in the way pointed out by this bill; but I have come to feel that in our Committee on Banking and Currency, of which the Senator from Colorado and myself are members, we are taking up every little cue that we can find anywhere, and are trying to amend and change many laws for which I can not find any necessity, and this is one of those laws.

I see no necessity for the passage of this bill. I do not object to it in principle, but it seems to me we are taking away from the States a duty which they have performed fully and satisfactorily up to this date. I do not know how many bills there are on this general subject; but why we should attempt, by the dozen or 15 bills which are now before the Committee on Banking and Currency, to change so many minor features of the law, is something beyond my comprehension. I can not understand it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator was present at the meeting of the committee when this matter was discussed. He did not raise such an objection at that time.

Mr. PAGE. I think the Senator is wrong. I did raise a pretty general objection as to the general idea that we must amend nearly every law upon the statute books with reference to national banks.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is not necessary to amend every law, and every law is not attempted to be amended.

Mr. PAGE. We have had a larger number of bills to amend the national banking laws at this session than we have had in all the nine years which I have been a Member of the Senate, and I do not understand why it should be so.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Federal reserve act took in a great many laws, and many of them were to some extent duplicates of what was in the national banking law. That bill was passed, and it probably took in a good many more than are contained in these little bills.

Mr. PAGE. Has this measure anything whatever to do with the Federal reserve act?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; it has not. It is an amendment of the national banking act.

Mr. PAGE. Yes; and the Senator says that so far as his knowledge goes the States have taken care of this matter satisfactorily.

Mr. SHAFROTH. My State has, but whether or not other States have, I do not know. Evidently there is a complaint in the department that there is a defect somewhere, and they have tried to cover it by this statute. I take the view, also, of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] that the amendment here about previous trial under State law is unnecessary, because the constitution of every State and the Constitution of the United States prevent a man being twice put in jeopardy for the same offense.

Mr. PAGE. Has the Senator received from the Comptroller of the Currency any concrete instance of any State where this crime has not been properly taken care of?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know. The comptroller was down before the committee and explained these bills. As a matter of fact, there is something in the hands of the chairman of the committee with relation to them, but I do not know that there has been anything specific. I think there were suggestions made that this would be an improvement of the banking law.

Mr. PAGE. I am ready to vote on the bill, and I am going to vote "No," not because there is anything especially wrong in it, but because I do not believe in so much tampering with the banking laws unless there is some demand for a change.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to ask the Senator what were the facts before his committee on which this bill is based? Were there any cases that had gone unwhipped of justice?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know. This bill was simply presented with the request that it be passed and the statement that it was desirable to amend the law in that respect. I do not think any particular question was asked as to the operation of the law.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield.

Mr. FALL. Is it not a fact that bills of this kind are prepared by some clerk in some department and are simply brought here and handed over to a committee and that that is the reason why the Senator can not explain the necessity for them?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No. The bill was drawn by the attorney for the Treasury Department and was presented to the committee and was introduced by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I was not present at the meeting at which these petty bills were recommended for passage, but I am rather surprised to hear the Senator from Colorado say that this bill was drawn by the attorney for the Treasury Department, or any other attorney. Certainly this expression on lines 6 and 7 does not sound as though it were drawn by an attorney. It is provided that a man who commits this offense, in order to be culpable, must do so "with intent to injure or defraud such association." Now, everybody knows that that is something which it would be very difficult to prove. It was unnecessary to insert such a provision in the law, because if an offender makes a false statement willfully that is sufficient to establish his guilt, and to add that he must do so with intent to injure or defraud the association simply makes the proof of guilt a very difficult matter.

Personally I feel that these petty bills which have been recommended by the Comptroller of the Currency are simply calculated to encumber the statutes and that there is no necessity for them. I am ready to vote, and vote against their passage.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I do not see how a man who gives any thought to this subject can call a bill protecting the national banks of the country from fraud and false statements and dealings a petty bill. The national banking act was passed under the stress of the Civil War. Many things were omitted from it. Some of those deficiencies have been supplied. As the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] says, in his 18 years' experience there have not been a dozen bills to amend the national banking act. That is the reason why it is necessary to handle so many matters now. It is not respectful for the United States of America to set up national banks having billions of assets to depend upon the State authorities to pass a law and furnish the machinery for punishing offenses against those institutions. It is not a petty matter. It is a most serious matter.

The other day the Senate killed a bill that was designed to prevent overdrawing in banks. It might have left the impression that the reason why Senators did it was because they found it was convenient to overdraw themselves. For heaven's sake do not let it go out that we are not going to punish overdrawing in banks so that we can embezzle from them. That can not be the intention of Senators. I do not believe it is.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, is it not true that all the State statutes against larceny and other offenses apply to national banks the same as to other corporations and to individuals?

Mr. HOLLIS. I do not know and the Senator does not know. He can not make that statement as a lawyer. I do not believe it is the fact; but whether it is or not——

Mr. KELLOGG. I say the criminal laws of the State apply to national banks, and I know the National Government has a code of laws particularly applying to national banks to punish crimes against them.

Mr. HOLLIS. The Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do know that.

Mr. HOLLIS. The national bank act covers the whole subject so far as those who had the act passed had vision to see what was going to arise.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I beg the Senator's pardon; let me answer the Senator from Minnesota. There are certain things that are provided. We have protected the national banks in certain particulars from embezzlement, but making a fraudulent statement in order to get a loan is not punishable. Whether the making of a fraudulent statement to get a loan from a bank is punishable in all States I do not know, and I say the Senator does not know. We assume that it is so; but if there be those who think the Federal authorities are powerless to go ahead in the Federal courts with Federal prosecutors to punish the infringement of State law, I say it is not a petty matter to be providing a method of punishment through Federal officials for a violation of this kind, which is a very serious violation against the Federal banking law. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I was going to ask the Senator what reason there is for the Federal Government taking upon itself the punishment of those who procure money from national banks by false statements any more than to undertake the punishment of burglars who break into banks. The law of the State punishes those men, and the fact was shown from the question addressed to the Senator from Colorado that there was apparently nothing before the Committee on Banking and Currency to show that in any State in any instance there has been a failure to prosecute men who procure loans by false representation.

Mr. HOLLIS. The Senator is mistaken in that. Burglary of a national bank is not punished under the State law, but is invariably punished under the national law. In sessions of the United States court the cases come up in that way. The yeggmen who loot post offices and banks are punished in the Federal courts. That is why they keep away from national banks and post offices as a rule and rob from grocery stores where there is not a post office. It does not take away from our duty to protect our national banks to call attention to what the State laws do. It is our duty to provide adequate punishment for any man who defrauds a national banking association and making a false statement. No Senator will deny that.

I am not at all afraid of harassing these gentlemen by providing that they shall be punished or prosecuted in one place or in forty, if they succeed in looting a bank by making a false statement, and I do not think any other Senator will if he really faces the proposition.

Mr. FALL. The Senator may have in his mind what he desires to reach; but, as was pointed out by the Senator from Nebraska, the bill does not attempt to reach them at all. The bill does not provide any penalty whatsoever for making a false statement or for obtaining money under false pretenses, unless the false statement or the act was done with intent to defraud the bank. If the amount is ever paid, if the bank is not defrauded, there is no offense whatsoever, although the burglary may have been committed in an attempt to obtain the loan. The statement of that Senator that it could not have been drawn by any lawyer who had any conception of what he was trying to reach unless he was simply trying to befog the issue is absolutely, in my judgment, correct. The bill is deceptive in attempting to do what the Senator says it was intended to do, and the amendment to it is ridiculous, in my judgment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I believe that the amendment to the bill is defective in language, and I therefore ask that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Banking and Currency for the purpose of perfecting the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is recommitted.

CORRUPT PRACTICES.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3438) to prevent corrupt practices in the election of Senators, Representatives, or Delegates in Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill be read first.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator from Ohio think we can finish the bill by 2 o'clock?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, it is a very short bill. It is a criminal statute looking to the punishment of corrupt practices, and I do not believe there will be very much difficulty in the matter. I think we can finish it within a few minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections with an amendment, in line 8, after the word "vote," to insert "or to vote for or against any particular candidate," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That whoever shall promise, offer, or give, or cause to be promised, offered, or given, any money or other things of value, or shall make or tender any contract, undertaking, obligation, gratuity, or security for the payment of money or for the delivery or conveyance of anything of value to any person or persons, either to vote or withhold their vote or to vote for or against any particular candidate at any general or special election for Senator or Representative or Delegate in Congress, shall be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator having the bill in charge if the present law does not cover those cases.

Mr. POMERENE. That is just the difficulty. It does not.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator explain in what particular it does not?

Mr. POMERENE. There is not a Federal statute reaching the question of corrupt buying or purchasing or influencing of votes at the election of Representative or Delegate or United States Senator. This matter was referred by the full committee to a subcommittee consisting of the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and I believe the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. I am satisfied that is correct from such casual examination as I have given to the subject.

Mr. KING. May I just say that all the Senator from Ohio states is true. It was referred to a subcommittee, and the subcommittee reported this bill. I said at the time it did not meet my approval, and I reserved the right to vote against it when it came into the Senate.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I introduced this bill to meet a condition that exists in my own State and has existed for many years and which is not unknown in other States.

In the election of 1914, when I was running for Congress in the second district of Rhode Island, I employed some detectives on election day, and as a result of their investigations and some other information brought to the attention of the district attorney 56 indictments were had—51 for violations of section 37 and 5 for violations of section 19. The indictments were demurred to and the demurrers were sustained by the district court, and upon writs of error the decisions were upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States. The cases were United States against Matthew T. Gradwell and others, and United States against Charles Hambly and others, which were decided in the October term, 1916. The court practically held that there was no criminal offense under Federal jurisdiction unless Congress made it so by statute, and that Congress had not so provided, because sections 37 and 19, the conspiracy sections of the law, did not apply.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GERRY. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. The sections of the statute to which the Senator refers were the sections of the Revised Statutes commonly known as the force bill, some of which were repealed.

Mr. GERRY. Sections 37 and 19 were both a part of the act, but they have not been repealed. Several other sections of the law have been repealed.

Mr. TOWNSEND and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Rhode Island yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. GERRY. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I should like to ask the author of this bill if the language "at any general or special election" applies to primary elections as well as to general elections?

Mr. GERRY. It does not.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does not the Senator think that that is where there is the greatest corruption in this country? In many States and in many localities the primary is the only contest there is, and there is no need of spending money in the election after the nomination has once been made; then the election follows as a matter of course. The great evil, as it occurs to me, in this country is that which attaches to the primary elections.

Mr. GERRY. Personally I would be very much in favor of having the primary included in the statute if it were not for the fact of the complications that it would involve. In my own State there is no primary law. As a general thing neither party holds any direct primary. We nominate on the old convention system. That is true of other States in the Union.

I also found that the courts have held in the case of the United States against Edward O'Toole et al., a West Virginia case, involving a conspiracy to defraud in a primary election, that such elections are regulated not by the Constitution or laws of the United States but by the laws of each State, and that the entire primary system was much more a State question than the actual election of a Senator or of a Representative at the polls.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

Mr. GERRY. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. Has not the State of Rhode Island laws against this offense?

Mr. GERRY. I was going to cover that. I will state that as far as the laws in my State on that question go they practically have been a dead letter. They have never been enforced.

Mr. HARDWICK. You have laws, though?

Mr. GERRY. We have certain bribery laws in my State that are never enforced.

Mr. HARDWICK. In other words, the Senator complains that the law is not enforced in his own State?

Mr. GERRY. I complain very bitterly that the laws are not enforced.

Mr. HARDWICK. In other words, the laws written there are not adequate?

Mr. GERRY. I think possibly the laws in my State may be adequate if they were enforced, but in the State of Rhode Island I regret to say we have a pampered, rotten borough system in the way that it existed in England prior to the reform bill. The town of West Greenwich, with a total vote of 117, has the same representation in the State senate as the city of Providence, that has two hundred and fifty times that vote. There are 33 towns and 6 cities in Rhode Island. The city of Providence has over thirty times the combined vote of the five towns of West Greenwich, Charlestown, Narragansett, Little Compton, and Exeter. It has almost twelve times the combined vote of one-third of the towns—West Greenwich, Charlestown, Narragansett, Little Compton, Exeter, Middletown, Portsmouth, Jamestown, Foster, Richmond, and Gloucester. It has a larger vote even than the combined vote of the entire 33 towns of Rhode Island, a total vote of over 30,000, yet it has no more representation in the State senate than West Greenwich, to which I have already referred. The importance to the party in power of controlling the vote of these towns is readily understood.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. GERRY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to ask the Senator a question not in regard to matters which depend on the State laws of Rhode Island but in regard to the bill. In line 9 in the amendment I notice it says "Vote for or against any particular candidate." Why not "any candidate"? "Any" covers particular and general candidates both. It would cover candidates who are particular and candidates who are not particular. Would not "any" cover everything? It is merely to simplify it that we should say "any candidate."

Mr. GERRY. As far as the Senator from Rhode Island is concerned, he is entirely willing to have the amendment made.

Mr. President, owing to the condition which exists in my State—and I am afraid it is not the only State in the Union, though I hope it is—it is very difficult to obtain the proper safeguards for elections that we should have, and therefore we are forced to seek Federal relief. It was for that reason that I introduced this bill and that I now ask for its passage. It can not do any harm. All it will do is to make bribery in the election of Senators and Representatives a criminal offense. I do not see how any right-minded individual can object to such a law whether its enforcement is given to a State or Federal court, for after all it will work for the betterment of the community. When we have a condition as we have in Rhode Island, where no one is prosecuted, although bribery is rampant; when the slightest sort of investigation, such as I made in 1914, causes the Federal grand jury to bring in something like 56 indictments, and those indicted included State senators, State representatives, one police commissioner, a chief of police, deputy chief of police, deputy sheriff, president of a town council, member of a town council, tax assessor, and collector of taxes, it seems to me we have a condition that needs remedying.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I agree thoroughly with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] that we ought to pass an act of this character. It is an act which simply and solely punishes bribery at elections where Federal officers are being chosen. There is no Member of this body who is or could be more opposed to the General Government assuming to regulate elections in the States than am I; but I think that the mere punishment of a crime such as bribery at elections may be safely committed to the charge of the Federal Government; and it will be an additional safeguard against that crime which I believe should be practically punished as treason.

The records of this body in one of its great committees disclose that I had to come here and point out to the Judiciary Committee the condition of things regarding the confirmation of the appointment of a man who had notoriously been engaged in bribery for a generation.

But speaking of State laws, we have in Delaware as strong State laws as there can be; in fact, they are embedded in our constitution; but I see no reason why, if we can not get punishment in one forum, we should be shut out of another. I did everything I could to bring about the repeal of the old iniquitous laws and to prevent the enactment of the force bill; but I can see no real reason why anybody should oppose giving two forums for the punishment of bribery at elections. I should be very glad to see the provisions of this bill extended to registration for elections as well as to elections.

I think everything the Senator from Rhode Island has said about the necessity of this act was very well considered, and I hope the Senate will pass the measure. It is very necessary in some States. I know it has been so in the past, and it would have been a very desirable thing. The possible punishment by a Federal court will prevent very largely the feeling of security that frequently offenders of this character have in believing that they will not be punished by the State courts. I think this proposed act is a very desirable one, and I agree entirely with what the Senator from Rhode Island has said.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] asked a moment ago as to whether or not there was some Federal statute on this subject. My answer was that there was not any such statute. During the election of 1916 a very large number of indictments were returned in the southern district of the State of Ohio for alleged frauds and corrupt voting at the presidential election. Some of those indicted men pleaded guilty and were fined; others who were prosecuted by writ of error had their cases carried to the Supreme Court of the United States. There are quite a number of these cases. The decision was handed down by Mr. Justice McReynolds. The syllabus of that case reads as follows:

1. A conspiracy to bribe voters at a general election within a State where presidential electors and Members of Congress are chosen is not a conspiracy "to commit any offense against the United States or to defraud the United States in any manner or for any purpose," within the United States Criminal Code. (Sec. 37.)

2. A conspiracy to bribe voters at a general election within a State where presidential electors and Members of Congress are to be chosen is not to injure or oppress any citizen in "the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States" within the United States Criminal Code. (Sec. 19.)

Those were general conspiracy statutes, and it was the theory of the Department of Justice that conspiracies to violate the election laws would be punishable under these sections. Mr. Justice McReynolds points out very clearly, I think, that in order to bring these acts within the provisions of those sections it would have to be done purely by a process of construction; and he refers to the fact in delivering the opinion that there was a Federal statute some years ago—I think prior to 1870—bearing upon this subject; but it was later repealed. So there is now no Federal statute upon the subject. For the information of Senators who may be interested in this matter, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice McReynolds in this case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The opinion referred to is as follows:

"Mr. Justice McReynolds delivered the opinion of the court:

"Except as to parties, the indictments in these six cases are alike. Each contains three counts; the first and second undertake to allege a conspiracy to injure and oppress, in violation of section 19, Criminal Code (35 Stat. L., 1092, ch. 321; Comp. Stat., 1916, sec. 10183), and the third a conspiracy to defraud the United States, contrary to section 37. Demurrers were sustained upon the ground that, rightly construed, neither section applies to the specified acts.

"Section 37, originally part of the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. L., 484, ch. 169; Comp. Stat., 1916, sec. 10201), provides: 'If two or more persons conspire either to commit any offense against the United States or to defraud the United States, in any manner or for any purpose, and one or more of such parties do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, each of the parties to such conspiracy shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.' It was considered in United States v. Gradwell (243 U. S., 476; 61 L. ed. 857; 37 Sup. Ct. Rep., 407) and held not applicable in circumstances similar to those here presented. The Government has accordingly abandoned the third count.

"Section 19 provides: 'If two or more persons conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or because of his having so exercised the same, or if two or more persons go in disguise on the highway or on the premises of another with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege so secured, they shall be fined not more than $5,000 and imprisoned not more than 10 years, and shall, moreover, be thereafter ineligible to any office or place of honor, profit, or trust created by the Constitution or laws of the United States.' And the two counts based thereon charge defendants with conspiring to injure candidates for presidential electors, the United States Senate, and Representatives in Congress at the regular election in Ohio, November 7, 1916, also qualified electors who might properly vote thereat, in the free exercise and enjoyment of certain rights and privileges secured by Constitution and laws of the United States, namely, the right (a) of being a candidate; (b) that only those duly qualified should vote; (c) that the results should be determined by voters who had not been bribed; and (d) that the election board should make a true and accurate count of votes legally cast by qualified electors and no others. The indictment further alleged the conspiracy was carried into effect as intended by purchasing votes of certain electors and causing election boards to receive them and make inaccurate returns.

"The real point involved is whether section 19 denounces as criminal a conspiracy to bribe voters at a general election within a State where presidential electors, a United States Senator, and a Representative in Congress are to be chosen. Our concern is not with the power of Congress, but with the proper interpretation of action taken by it. This must be ascertained in view of the settled rule that 'there can be no constructive offenses, and before a man can be punished his case must be plainly and unmistakably within the statute' (United States v. Lacher, 134 U. S., 624, 628; 33 L. ed., 1080, 1083; 10 Sup. Ct. Rep., 625), and the policy of Congress to leave the conduct of elections at which its members are chosen to State law alone, except where it may have expressed a clear purpose to establish some further or definite regulation.

"Departing from the course long observed, by act of May 31, 1870 (16 Stats. L., 140, ch. 114), Congress undertook to prescribe a comprehensive system intended to secure freedom and integrity of elections. Section 19 of that act declares 'that if at any election for Representative or Delegate in the Congress of the United States any person shall knowingly, by force, threat, menace, intimidation, bribery, reward, or offer, or promise thereof, or otherwise unlawfully prevent any qualified voter of any State of the United States of America, or of any Territory thereof, from freely exercising the right of suffrage, or compel or induce by any such means or otherwise any officer of an election in any such State or Territory to receive a vote from a person not legally qualified or entitled to vote, or aid, counsel, procure, or advise any such voter, person, or officer to do any act hereby made a crime, every such person shall be deemed guilty of a crime, and shall for such crime be liable to prosecution in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years, or both, in the discretion of the court, and shall pay the costs of prosecution.' In pursuance of a well-understood policy, the act of February 8, 1894 (chap. 25, 28 Stats. L., 36, Comp. Stat., 1916, sec. 1015), repealed the foregoing and other kindred sections in act of 1870, but left in effect section 6, then section 5508, Revised Statutes (Comp. Stat., 1916, sec. 10183), and now section 19, Criminal Code. (See United States v. Mosley, 238 U. S., 383, 59 L. Ed., 1355, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 904; United States v. Gradwell, supra.)

"The Government, in effect, maintains that lawful voters at an election for presidential electors, Senator, and Member of Congress, and also the candidates for those places, have secured to them by the Constitution or laws of the United States the right and privilege that it shall be fairly and honestly conducted, and that Congress intended by section 6, act of 1870, to punish interference with such right and privilege through conspiracy to influence voters by bribery.

"Section 19, Criminal Code, of course, now has the same meaning as when first enacted as section 6, act of 1870 (see Criminal Code, secs. 339, 341 (35 Stats. L., 1153, ch. 321; Comp. Stat. 1916, secs. 10513, 10515)); and considering the policy of Congress not to interfere with elections within a State except by clear and specific provisions, together with the rule respecting construction of criminal statutes, we can not think it was intended to apply to conspiracies to bribe voters. Bribery, expressly denounced in another section of the original act, is not clearly within the words used, and the reasoning relied on to extend them thereto would apply in respect of almost any act reprehensible in itself, or forbidden by State statutes, and supposed injuriously to affect freedom, honesty, or integrity of an election. This conclusion is strengthened by express repeal of the section applicable in terms to bribery, and we think is rendered entirely clear by considering the nature of the rights or privileges fairly within intendment of original section 6.

"The right or privilege to be guarded, as indicated both by the language employed and context, was a definite, personal one, capable of enforcement by a court and not the political, nonjudicable one common to all, that the public shall be protected against harmful acts, which is here relied on. The right to vote is personal and we have held it is shielded by the section in question. (Ex parte Yarbrough, 110 U. S., 651; 28 L. ed., 274; 4 Sup. Ct. Rep., 152; United States v. Mosley, supra.) The same is true of the right to make homestead entry (United States v. Waddell, 112 U. S., 76; 28 L. ed., 673; 5 Sup. Ct. Rep., 35); also of the right of one held by a United States marshal to protection against lawless violence (Logan v. United States, 144 U. S. 263; 36 L. ed., 429; 12 Supt. Ct. Rep., 617). While the opinion in United States against Gradwell (243 U. S., 476; 61 L. ed., 857; 37 Sup. Ct. Rep., 407) does not determine the precise question now presented, it proceeds upon reasoning which contravenes the theory urged by counsel for the Government.

"The court below properly construed the statute and its judgments are affirmed."

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have not been able to hear all of the arguments which have been made on this matter. I could not hear the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] on account of the confusion in the Chamber, and I am not sure now whether or not the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has been discussing the primary question. Has he?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have not.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Well, I desire, then, to call attention to the fact that this bill falls far short of reaching what, to my mind, is the greatest evil that attaches to Federal elections.

I am in hearty sympathy with the object that Senators have in mind and am willing to support it; but we ought not to leave out the primary elections and simply make the proposed law apply to general and special elections. The fact is that in a great number of the States there is no contest at the election at all. The contest is at the primaries; that is where money has been corruptly expended. We do have State laws which have for their object a suppression of this evil. This is true in Delaware and Rhode Island, but in those States they have no primary law, and naturally money is used at the elections. But Senators from those States say that the State law is disregarded, hence the demand for a Federal statute. I believe in almost all of those States which do have primaries—and they are in the majority—the great offenses have been committed in the primary. If Senators want to purify the elections—and who does not—if they want to be certain that no corruption is practiced, they should begin at the source, where the greatest inducement is offered for improper use of money and influence. We have the primary system now in a majority of the States; we have the election of Senators by direct vote of the people; and yet if by Federal statute we should discriminate against the primary we would apparently look with tolerance at least upon the use of money and all kinds of corruption in selecting the candidate, after which his election is absolutely sure. We stop far short of what we ought to reach in legislation of this kind.

The Senator from Tennessee has informed me that there is a decision by a Federal court, which has recently been rendered, which holds that the Federal Government has no control over the primaries. He tells me that the decision has not yet been printed; but it seems to me a most unusual doctrine if that is true. We exercised control over the legislatures when the legislatures elected Senators, and that same control ought to obtain in the nomination and election of Senators by the people, because, I repeat, the nomination in many cases is equivalent to an election, and no money or pledges are required in the latter. I would like to have the bill amended so as to include the primaries.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator will allow me, he has just referred to a decision bearing upon the subject of primaries. I am not familiar with that decision, but have been informed that it has been rendered.

I am personally in hearty accord with the Senator's views with respect to the necessity for this legislation. I do not agree with him, however, that there are more frauds in the primaries than there are at the general elections. That, however, is neither here nor there; there ought to be none in either. My feeling is that it would be much better to allow this bill to be passed as it now is; and I shall be glad to join efforts with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] to prepare a bill applying to the primaries if we find that under the decision which has been referred to we have the authority to do so.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ought to say that the Senator from Tennessee tells me this is a case that originated in Kansas and was a decision by a judge in Kansas. The Senator from Kansas understands it to be simply an opinion of the attorney general of the State as to the matter and not a decision of the court. What I would like to have done——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will yield in a moment. What I would like to have done in this case is to insert the word "primary" after the word "any"; and if the committee having this bill in charge finds that there has been a decision which negatives the right of Congress to pass such legislation, I am willing that the word be omitted; but I think that the primaries ought to be covered by this bill.

One of the great arguments against the primary system is that the wealthy candidate has the poor one at great disadvantage; that the former can use unlimited amounts of money, and thereby prevent the election of a man of limited means; but if it is even suggested in legislation that money can be used corruptly and that we are making an invidious distinction between the primaries and the general election, more corruption still, I am afraid, will exist in the country. So I am asking, if the committee will do so, to insert the word "primary" and a comma after the word "any," in line 9; and if the committee thinks it evident that the decision, if one has been rendered, denies to Congress the power to legislate on the matter of primaries it can strike out the amendment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I promised to yield to the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] a little while ago, and I yield to him first.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Michigan how the question as to the power of the Federal Government to regulate primary nominations of candidates for the Senate would come before the Supreme Court? I do not understand that there has been any attempt on the part of the Federal Government through Congress to exercise that authority, and until the attempt has been made I fail to understand how the question could be before the court, and consequently fail to understand how the court could render any decision on it. There was a case some months ago, arising in West Virginia, in which the Supreme Court of the United States held that the Federal statute did not apply to the primaries; they held that it was not the intention of Congress to make it apply. There might have been such a decision as that, but I fail to see how we could have a decision on the question that the Federal Government did not have the authority.

Mr. KENYON. That was the very question in the West Virginia case.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the Senator from Iowa will pardon me a moment, that was my understanding of the West Virginia case; but the Senator from Tennessee informs me that there has been a recent case originating in Kansas where some Federal court has rendered a decision which has not yet been published; not the Supreme Court, for the Supreme Court has not passed upon it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My question would have the same application to any Federal court.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is right; I so understand. And therefore I do not think we ought to shy at this proposition on the mere suggestion that possibly some court has rendered an opinion when that opinion has not been brought into the Senate. The question was not raised, as I understand, in the West Virginia case. The decision stated that Congress did not intend the law to apply to the primary. That is my understanding of the decision, although I do not recall having read it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I now yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to say to the Senator that of course we are chiefly concerned with those things which we know about. The bill which is now presented will cover the cases that I have known of personally, which should be provided for by law.

I have no objection to covering the primaries so far as my views are concerned, but in my own State we have not the general primaries; we still nominate by convention; and of course that would require certain other machinery. I have no objection to that being provided, but the law as proposed here would cover the greatest evils with which I have been made familiar.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understand that; but does not the Senator think——

Mr. SAULSBURY. And I only want to suggest to the Senator that I will join with him in covering the matter of bribery at primaries at any time when he will bring such a measure before Congress, but I do hope that we may be able now, and quickly, to pass this very simple bill covering bribery at elections, and I will be very glad to have it cover bribery at registrations.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Let me suggest to the Senator that it does not seem to me to be good form to enact a general statute that is applicable simply to Delaware and Rhode Island, the two cases mentioned where the State law is not enforced, and where they ask for a Federal statute to help them out. I believe it to be general information that corruption does prevail in primaries in many States, which should be reached, if possible, by a general statute, and the insertion of the word "primary" will cover the ground. It will not be necessary to have any extra committee work or any new bill to be introduced to cover the case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HARDWICK. I object.

Mr. GRONNA. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. GRONNA subsequently said: Mr. President, I wish to make an explanation of why I objected to the consideration of the bill in charge of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. I think it is pretty well known that for a number of years I have had pending in Congress a so-called corrupt-practices bill, which I think is wider in scope than the bill which has been under consideration. The bill which was before the Senate and reported by the Senator from Ohio would not apply to conditions in my State; but that is not the reason why I objected to it. I do not think it will at all cover the conditions or the cases that arise in connection with corrupt practices. We know that the people who have a standing in the community such as will entitle them to go out and ask the people for their votes will not undertake to buy votes. That is not the way in which these election laws are being violated. It is done in some other way; and I look upon this bill as more of a subterfuge than anything else. Personally, I am heartily in favor of the enactment of a law that will cover corrupt practices in elections.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to say a word in reply, I think the Senator is very wrong when he says that a bill of this kind is a subterfuge. Several years ago I went pretty thoroughly into the power of Congress to pass laws relating to primaries for the selection of delegates to presidential elections, and against my will I came to the conclusion that the Congress of the United States does not have the power to control that situation. While I do not have in mind especially the bill to which the Senator refers as having been prepared and presented by him, I have rather an indistinct recollection that it applied to presidential elections. Am I right?

Mr. GRONNA. No; Mr. President, it does not apply to presidential elections.

Mr. POMERENE. Then I am mistaken about that; but I shall be very glad to join hands with any of the Senators who are interested in this subject and see whether something more comprehensive may not be worked out. However, the fact that we can not agree as to everything that should be done is no reason why we should not meet the more flagrant evils which do exist; and they exist in all parts of the country, I am sorry to say.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that a subcommittee, consisting of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and myself, worked on this question, taking up the Senator's bill and a number of other bills. I think we worked for two weeks solidly during the Christmas vacation, and constructed a bill, which we all discovered was a very, very difficult thing to do. We went over all of these questions, and I invite the Senator to examine that bill. We reported it to the Committee on Privileges and Elections; but the Senator realizes that the multitudinous number of intricate questions involved in a bill of that kind makes it almost impossible to construct a workable bill.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I trust that the Senator from Iowa will not understand me as criticizing the committee in any way.

Mr. KENYON. Oh, no.

Mr. GRONNA. That was not my thought.

Mr. KENYON. We felt that in this bill we might correct one of the glaring faults.

Mr. GRONNA. I am sure the committee is doing its duty with respect to this matter, but it is an important matter, and when we do pass a corrupt-practices act it ought, at least in some respects, to apply to all the States of this country.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Military Academy appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will not the Senator withdraw that and allow me to make a motion?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I understood that we were disposing of the calendar and that the bill which was under consideration had been objected to.

Mr. POMERENE. We were not proceeding under a unanimous-consent rule, as I understand. I had asked unanimous consent to take up the particular bill which was under consideration, and that was the matter before the Senate when an objection was made. Then the Senator from Oregon got the floor and asked to take up the appropriation bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I ask the Senator what bill he has in mind?

Mr. POMERENE. The bill to provide against bribery at elections of Representatives and Senators.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think that can be finished by 2 o'clock.

Mr. HARDWICK. We could not finish that bill in that time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. We can almost finish the appropriation bill by 2 o'clock. The Senate committee has made very few changes in it, and I hope that we may be permitted to go ahead with it. At 2 o'clock the unfinished business will probably be taken up, and the Senator's bill would not then be in order, anyway. I insist upon my motion, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 11185.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 11185) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the bill be read for amendments, the amendments of the committee to be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon requests that the formal reading of the bill be pretermitted. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Secretary will read the bill for committee amendments.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 2, line 1, in the subhead, to strike out "Permanent Establishment," and insert "Pay of Military Academy."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 1, to insert:

Permanent establishment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, at the end of line 3, it is proposed to strike out the period and insert a semicolon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, that seems to be an error in the printing of the bill. Inasmuch as it occurs in a number of other places, I ask that the clerks be permitted to correct it wherever it occurs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and the clerks will be authorized to make the necessary corrections.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 4, after the word "chaplain," to strike out "$2,400" and insert "$3,000."

For pay of one chaplain, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 6, after the word "cadets," to strike out "$600,000" and insert "$750,000: Provided, That for the current fiscal year the pay of cadets shall be fixed at $780 per annum and one ration per day, or commutation therefor, such commutation to be 67 per cent over and above the cost of the Army ration, to be paid from the appropriation for the subsistence of the Army," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of cadets, $750,000: Provided, That for the current fiscal year the pay of cadets shall be fixed at $780 per annum and one ration per day, or commutation therefor, such commutation to be 67 per cent over and above the cost of the Army ration, to be paid from the appropriation for the subsistence of the Army.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I take it for granted that the $150,000 increase here is to cover the additional allowance made to each cadet. If that is true, I should like to have the Senator state what the increase is.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the present pay of the cadets is $50 per month. This increases their pay $15 per month, or to $65 per month, and the increased appropriation is made to meet that increased allowance. I may say to the Senator that Col. Tillman and Col. Timberlake, who came down here representing the Academy, say that the amount that is now allowed cadets is insufficient to enable them to live and keep out of debt, because of the increased cost of clothing and the increased cost of living.

Mr. SMOOT. Are the rations in this bill the same as are allowed in past acts?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The bill increases the ration—not materially. The ration that they have had is 40 cents. This bill increases it 67⅝ per cent over the ration of the enlisted men of the Army, just as stated in the amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, and the Secretary read to line 25 on page 2, the last paragraph read being:

For pay of three battalion commanders (majors) in addition to pay as captains, $1,800.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, does that mean that these battalion commanders get $600 each in addition to their pay as captains?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes. It gives the captains the pay of a major.

Mr. SMOOT. It is $600 each, not $1,800 each?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, under the subhead "Pay of civilians," on page 12, after line 1, to insert:

Provided, That the clerk now holding the position of "order and purchasing clerk" in the quartermaster's office shall, on his own application, after 50 years in the military and civil service of the United States, be entitled to be placed on the retired list of the Army with the pay of a retired pay clerk, Quartermaster Corps, of the same period of service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 8, before the word "clerks," to strike out "nine" and insert "ten," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of 10 clerks and stenographers employed at headquarters, United States Military Academy, in the offices of the superintendent and adjutant, as follows:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, after line 14, to insert:

One clerk, $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 3, after the word "cadets," to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$3,600," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of two expert civilian instructors in fencing, broadsword exercises, and other military gymnastics as may be required to perfect this part of the training of cadets, $3,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 6, after the word "swimming," to strike out "$1,500" and insert "$1,800," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of one professional civilian instructor in military gymnastics, fencing, boxing, wrestling, and swimming, $1,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 9, after the word "swimming," to strike out "$4,000" and insert "$3,600," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of two expert assistant civilian instructors in military gymnastics, fencing, boxing, wrestling, and swimming, $3,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 16, after the word "librarian," to strike out "(increase $200 submitted)," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of one assistant librarian, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 23, after the word "same," to strike out "$1,100" and insert "$1,440," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of one assistant engineer of same, $1,440.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 24, to strike out:

For pay of eight firemen, $6,240.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 14, to insert:

For pay of three firemen, $3,060.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 1, to insert:

For pay of five firemen, $4,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 14, after the word "plumber," to strike out "$900" and insert "$1,200," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of one assistant plumber, $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 15, after the word "helper," to strike out "$600" and insert "$840," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of one plumber's helper, $840.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 17, after the word "choirmaster," to strike out "$1,500" and insert "$1,700," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of chapel organist and choirmaster, $1,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 11, after the words "cadets' mess," to strike out "$900" and insert "$1,200," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of one engineer of steam, electric, and refrigerating apparatus for the cadets' mess, $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 20, after the words "power plant," to strike out "$3,600" and insert "$4,200," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of three engineers for power plant, $4,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 21, after the words "power plant," to strike out "$1,440" and insert "$1,800," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of two oilers for power plant, $1,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 3, after the words "Military Academy," to strike out "$1,196,605.95" and insert "$1,354,197.95," so as to make the clause read:

Total pay of Military Academy, $1,354,197.95.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Current and ordinary expenses," on page 20, line 19, after the word "sinks," to strike out "to be immediately available, $5,000" and insert "$49,000: Provided, That $5,000 of this appropriation be, and the same is hereby, made immediately available," so as to make the clause read:

For general repairs and enlargement of cadet camp, to include authorized strength of the Corps of Cadets for fiscal year 1919; repairs to camp grounds, tent platforms, painting, shower baths, renewing plumbing and flush bowls in underground sinks, $49,000: Provided, That $5,000 of this appropriation be, and the same is hereby, made immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 22, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$184,605" and insert "$228,605," so as to make the clause read:

Total, current and ordinary expenses, $228,605.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Miscellaneous items and incidental expenses," on page 26, line 9, after the words "the same is," to insert "hereby," so as to make the clause read:

For water pipe, plumbing, and repairs, $7,000: Provided, That $1,000 of this appropriation be, and the same is hereby, made immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 14, after the word "advertising," to insert "and to be immediately available," so as to make the clause read:

Repairs and improvements to the laundry machinery and apparatus in the cadet laundry, and the purchase of new material, tools, etc., to be expended without advertising, and to be immediately available, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Buildings and grounds," on page 31, after line 5, to insert:

Total, Military Academy, $2,889,306.25.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the committee amendments.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, unless the Senator in charge of the bill has serious objections, I am disposed to offer as an amendment to this bill a measure which the Senate has already passed, reported from the Senator's committee, with reference to the furnishing of uniforms to officers by the Government. Apparently no action has been taken in the other body. There certainly is a very crying need for the passage of this legislation, and it seems that the only way to get action upon it is to put it on this bill or on the military appropriation bill. I can see no objection to its going on here.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator from Washington that I have no objection to that. It seems to me that it ought to apply to the cadets as well as to the Army, because their uniforms have gone up from 25 to 100 per cent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Then, Mr. President, I offer that amendment. The War Department have reported that they can comply with this requirement without any trouble, and it ought to be enacted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington offers an amendment which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 35, after line 19, it is proposed to insert:

That all uniforms, accouterments, and equipment required for any officer of the military or naval forces of the United States shall be furnished and issued to such officers by the Government at cost price, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, and the same shall be similar in quality and price for all officers of the same rank.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that in order to complete his amendment there should be included in it the words "including cadets at the Military and Naval Academies."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well; that is satisfactory. I will ask to have the amendment modified in that way.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let that be inserted where it refers to officers of the Army and Navy.

The SECRETARY. After the words "United States," in line 3 of the amendment, it is proposed to insert "including cadets at the Military and Naval Academies," so as to read:

That all uniforms, accouterments, and equipment required for any officer of the military or naval forces of the United States, including cadets at the Military and Naval Academies, shall be furnished—

And so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Calder	Curtis	France
Baird	Chamberlain	Dillingham	Gallinger
Bankhead	Culberson	Fernald	Gronna

Mr. HOLLIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] are detained on official business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 4557.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4557) to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act shall be known as the vocational-rehabilitation act. That the word "board," as hereinafter used in this act, shall mean the "Federal Board for Vocational Education." That the word "bureau," as hereinafter used in this act, shall mean the "Bureau of War-Risk Insurance."

SEC. 2. That every person who is disabled under circumstances entitling him, after discharge from the military or naval forces of the United States, to compensation under Article III of the act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended, hereinafter referred to as "said act," and who, after his discharge, in the opinion of the board, is unable to carry on a gainful occupation, to resume his former occupation, or to enter upon some other occupation, or having resumed or entered upon such occupation is unable to continue the same successfully, shall be furnished by the said board, where vocational rehabilitation is feasible, such course of vocational rehabilitation as the board shall prescribe and provide.

The board shall have power, and it shall be its duty, to furnish the persons included in this section suitable courses of vocational rehabilitation to be prescribed and provided by the board, and every person electing to follow such a course of vocational rehabilitation shall, while following the same, receive monthly compensation equal to the amount of his monthly pay for the last month of his active service, or equal to the amount to which he would be entitled under Article III of said act, whichever amount is the greater. If such person was an enlisted man at the time of his discharge, for the period during which he is so afforded a course of rehabilitation, his family shall receive compulsory allotment and family allowance according to the terms of Article II of said act in the same manner as if he were an enlisted man, and for the purpose of computing and paying compulsory allotment and family allowance his compensation shall be treated as his monthly pay: Provided, That if such person willfully fails or refuses to follow the prescribed course of vocational rehabilitation which he has elected to follow, in a manner satisfactory to the board, the said board in its discretion may certify to that effect to the bureau and the said bureau shall, during such period of failure or refusal, withhold any part or all of the monthly compensation due such person and not subject to compulsory allotment which the said board may have determined should be withheld.

The military and naval family allowance appropriation provided for in section 18 of said act shall be available for the payment of the family allowances provided by this section; and the military and naval compensation appropriation provided for in section 19 of said act shall be available for the payment of the monthly compensation herein provided. No compensation under Article III of said act shall be paid for the period during which any such person is furnished by said board a course of vocational rehabilitation except as is hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 3. That the courses of vocational rehabilitation provided for under this act shall, as far as practicable and under such conditions as the board may prescribe, be made available without cost for instruction for the benefit of any person who is disabled under circumstances entitling him, after discharge from the military or naval forces of the United States, to compensation under Article III of said act, and who is not included in section 2 hereof: Provided, That no monthly compensation, family allowances, or expenses as provided by this act shall be paid on account of any such person availing himself of the courses under this section: And provided further, That nothing in this section shall deprive any such person of the benefit of the provisions of said act.

SEC. 4. That the board shall have the power and it shall be its duty to provide such facilities, instructors, and courses as may be necessary to insure proper training for such persons as are required to follow such courses as herein provided; to prescribe the courses to be followed by such persons; to pay, when in the discretion of the board such payment is necessary, the expense of travel, lodging, subsistence, and other necessary expenses of such persons while following the prescribed courses; to do all things necessary to insure vocational rehabilitation; to provide for the placement of rehabilitated persons in suitable or gainful occupations. The board shall have the power to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary for the proper performance of its duties as prescribed by this act, and is hereby authorized and directed to utilize, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, the facilities of the Department of Labor, in so far as may be practicable, in the placement of rehabilitated persons in suitable or gainful occupations.

SEC. 5. That it shall also be the duty of the board to make or cause to have made studies, investigations, and reports regarding the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons and their placement in suitable or gainful occupations. When the board deems it advisable, such studies, investigations, and reports may be made in cooperation with or through other departments and bureaus of the Government, and the board in its discretion may cooperate with such public or private agencies as it may deem advisable in performing the duties imposed upon it by this act.

SEC. 6. That all medical and surgical work or other treatment necessary to give functional and mental restoration to disabled persons prior to their discharge from the military or naval forces of the United States shall be under the control of the War Department and the Navy Department, respectively. Whenever prevocational training is employed as a therapeutic measure by the War Department or the Navy Department a plan shall be established between these agencies and the board acting in an advisory capacity to insure, in so far as medical requirements permit, a proper process of prevocational training and the proper preparation of instructors for such prevocational training.

The board shall, in establishing its plans and rules and regulations for vocational training, cooperate with the War Department and the Navy Department in so far as may be necessary to effect a continuous process of prevocational and vocational training.

SEC. 7. That the board is hereby authorized and empowered to receive such gifts and donations from either public or private sources as may be offered unconditionally. All moneys received as gifts or donations shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and shall constitute a permanent fund, to be called the "Special fund for vocational rehabilitation," to be used under the direction of the said board, in connection with the appropriations hereby made or hereafter to be made, to defray the expenses of providing and maintaining courses of vocational rehabilitation; and a full report of all gifts and donations offered and accepted, and all disbursements therefrom, shall be submitted annually to Congress by said board.

SEC. 8. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, available immediately and until expended, the sum of $2,000,000 or so much thereof as may be necessary to be used by the Federal Board for Vocational Education for the purposes of this act, to wit, for renting and remodeling buildings and quarters, repairing, maintaining, and equipping same, and for equipment and other facilities necessary for proper instruction of disabled persons, $250,000; for the preparation of instructors and salaries of instructors, supervisors, and other experts, including necessary traveling expenses, $545,000; for traveling expenses of disabled persons in connection with training and for lodging, subsistence, and other necessary expenses in special cases of persons following prescribed courses, $250,000; for tuition for persons pursuing courses in existing institutions, public or private, $545,000; for the placement and supervision after placement of vocationally rehabilitated persons, $45,000; for studies, investigations, reports, and preparation of special courses of instruction, $55,000; for miscellaneous contingencies, including special mechanical appliances necessary in special cases for disabled men, $110,000; and for the administrative expenses of said board incident to performing the duties imposed by this act, including salaries of such assistants, experts, clerks, and other employees in the District of Columbia or elsewhere as the board may deem necessary, actual traveling and other necessary expenses incurred by the members of the board and by its employees under its orders, including attendance at meetings of educational associations and other organizations, rent and equipment of offices in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, purchase of books of reference, law books, and periodicals, stationery, typewriters and exchange thereof, miscellaneous supplies, postage on foreign mail, printing and binding to be done at the Government Printing Office, and all other necessary expenses, $200,000.

SEC. 9. That said board shall file with the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate on July 1 and every three months thereafter, for the information of the Congress, an itemized account of all expenditures made under this act, including names and salaries of employees. Said board shall also make an annual report to the Congress of its doings under this act on or before December 1 of each year.

SEC. 10. That section 304 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended, is hereby repealed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, only during this war has it been fully realized what can be accomplished by vocational training for the rehabilitation of the injured soldiers and sailors. In Belgium before the war they had one institute for the vocational training of the injured in industries with a view of rehabilitating them. As the Germans swept through Belgium the director of that institution went to France, and at Lyon, France, shortly after his arrival, an institution was organized to apply the principles that had been used in Belgium at Charleroi to the rehabilitation of soldiers and sailors injured in the service. From that beginning at Lyon it went through all the allied countries. In England, in France, in Italy, and in Canada splendid work has been done to refit for various occupations those who are injured in the service, and who, according to past lines of treatment, were considered out of the activities of life.

The result of the experience of these countries has been that 1 per cent, at least, of those who enlisted in the army and received injuries which would disqualify them for any future occupation can, through new systems of vocational training, be rehabilitated and be made capable of practical accomplishment, capable of becoming a part of the economic life of their country.

Your committee in preparing this bill worked with the Committee on Education of the House. It has been a subject that has attracted attention all over the country for a number of months past. We had the benefit of the work of many others in finally preparing the bill. Philanthropists met here several months ago and called into conference those who had studied the subject. Subsequently a committee headed by the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, selected, as I understand, by the Council of National Defense, took up the subject and worked upon it. Utilizing the work of all these, a bill was prepared and introduced in the House and introduced in the Senate. That bill was considered by the committee of the House and the committee of the Senate jointly, and for a number of days we had hearings.

Through the courtesy of the British Ambassador the director of this work in Canada came to us and gave us a full account of what had been done in Canada and how it was conducted. You will find upon the desk of each Senator to-day a copy of the testimony taken before the committees. Without reference to this bill, I wish to commend that little pamphlet to you. I really think it is worth keeping. The hearing to me was fascinating. The possibilities of accomplishing so much, even though those men had not been in the front fighting for us, was inspiring, and, with added thought that we were to do this work for the men who had risked their lives for their country, the desire to accomplish this work for them was irresistible.

We finally rewrote the bill and at last introduced it as a new bill, and it has been introduced in the House just as it has been introduced here. We indefinitely postponed the first bill introduced.

The great question is not whether this work shall be done, because everyone must desire that our country take up the problem as other nations have to furnish the opportunity for vocational training to rehabilitate the injured in the Army and in the Navy. The real question I feel that you will wish to consider is, How can we best do it? We all intend to do it. I have never met anyone in the Halls of Congress or outside who did not believe it was a national responsibility to furnish the opportunity for rehabilitation to these men.

Let me repeat; the experience of Canada and I think the experience of the other countries has been that at least 1 per cent of those in the army, receiving injuries from which they would otherwise be able to do nothing, can be restored to successful activities by properly directed vocational training——

Mr. PAGE. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. PAGE. Is it not true that in our hearings the fact was developed that only 1 per cent of all who go abroad and come back were likely to be the recipients of the benefits of this bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One per cent of those who go abroad; but we will also have those who go out of the camps who are mustered out on account of physical ailments, and that is why we did not limit it to 1 per cent of those who went abroad.

Mr. PAGE. I believe only 10 per cent of those Canadians who went abroad were sent home as disabled, and of that 10 per cent practically all but 1 per cent returned to their former avocations and took up their old form of life work. This means that probably only 1 per cent of our soldiers who go abroad will receive the benefits of this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One per cent of those who go abroad?

Mr. PAGE. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The reason why I said not less than 1 per cent was because 1 per cent of those who go abroad take advantage of it. As we have mustered out of the service from camps men suffering from tuberculosis and other troubles, I have no doubt that some of them can receive also special benefit from vocational training to fit them for active work.

Mr. PAGE. I would like to quote just a few words from the hearings before our committee on this point. I quote from Dr. Prosser's statement:

> Dr. PROSSER. Out of 41,000 soldiers who have been returned to Canada, for all sorts of reasons, approximately 2,400 have taken courses of vocational rehabilitation.
> Senator PAGE. And all the rest?
> Dr. PROSSER. Some of the others are insane, some are epileptic, thousands of them went back to their old occupations.
> The figures work out this way: Canada has sent about 250,000 men across the water. One per cent of 250,000 is 2,500; they have had about 2,400 men in training. That is where I get my coefficient, that 1 per cent of the men overseas will need vocational rehabilitation, and it agrees very closely with what we get from Great Britain.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I assume, of course, that when our troops get into more active fighting on the other side the 1 per cent will be largely increased, will it not?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The estimate of Canada was that 1 per cent of those who go abroad are capable of being restored to useful service by vocational training for rehabilitation purposes. Of course, more than that number will be injured; but, as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] said, many of those injured go back into their ordinary lines of service without needing special training. Some of them are so injured that no special training will help them. The estimate was 1 per cent formed the classes that otherwise would be able to do nothing, but who, taken charge of and retrained vocationally, could be made valuable useful citizens, capable of doing work.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand the Senator now. That is the Canadian experience?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; that is the Canadian experience.

Mr. PAGE. May I interrupt the Senator to state to the Senator from Connecticut that from what appeared at our hearings as to Canadian experience with reference to men wounded in battle we shall probably find that the casualties in our fighting on the front will not be materially different from that of our Canadian neighbors, who have already experienced some very severe fighting.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If we have this year a million men abroad, out of that number, according to the experience of Canada, there will be 10,000 the future of whose lives will probably be a blank so far as any line of active work or employment would go, but who, through rehabilitation as a result of vocational training, preparing them for something which otherwise they could not have done, may be made useful and effective citizens and into their lives may still be kept the privilege of being a part of their country.

Mr. GALLINGER. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that in reference to this bill I have done what I very often neglect to do; that is, I have read every word of it and tried to understand it. Yet I am afraid I do not fully comprehend the scope of it. It proposes teachers and schools for these men under certain conditions, as I recall it. I ask the Senator if it is proposed that these men shall be collected in places where they will form a community, as it were?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not necessarily at all. The experience of Canada is that, as far as possible, it is best to have their training as near their homes as practicable.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the very thing that troubles me on that point. We will suppose that two or three men are injured from a given community, a little city or town of greater or less consequence. Of course, they prefer to come to their homes when they return. That is the natural thing for them to do. Does this plan contemplate that those people in their own community—two or three or four or five of them—can have the benefit of this bill in the matter of instruction and help in various directions?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It would depend very largely upon the character of the injury and the character of the instruction required. The bill places the responsibility for handling the problem upon the Federal Board for Vocational Education. That was one of the first things to be done to determine upon whom should be placed the responsibility for handling it. If the Senator will allow me just for a moment, I will be glad to mention before the Senate, some having come into the Senate since the subject was before the Senate two years ago, just what our Federal Board for Vocational Education is. We have had before the country for several years the problem of national vocational education. Five or six years ago we almost passed a measure upon that subject. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] was the loyal leader in behalf of it. In March, 1913, I introduced a joint resolution to create a board of nine to study the problem of national aid to vocational education and to present a plan. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and I served on that board. We perfected a bill which was accepted unanimously by the Senate and passed by the House creating a board of seven men, who constituted the Federal Board for Vocational Education. They consist of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of Labor, the Commissioner of Education, and three appointed from men not in official position. Of the three selected by the President was Mr. Monroe, of Boston, representing manufacture, commerce, and the industries properly. He is a graduate of the Boston Technological School, a success in his own business, and for a number of years has given most of his time to the study of vocational training simply in the interest of his fellow men. He was the president of the Alumni Association of the Boston Technological Institute, the editor of the Technological Journal, a man splendidly versed, splendidly trained, with all the heart and enthusiasm which are necessary for this great work.

The second member of the board was required by the statute to represent agriculture. He is from Indiana—Mr. Greathouse. He has been a very successful farmer, a large owner of land, which he has had cultivated under his direction with great success; he is interested in education, and at one time, I understand, was the superintendent of education of his State. I think he is doing excellent work upon this board.

The third member under the act must represent labor proper. Mr. Holman, who is known to many of you, a most excellent man, was designated from that class.

So this is the board. They organized 12 months ago. Since that time they have been in conference with superintendents of education, the presidents of State universities, the directors of technological and industrial and agricultural education in the States. They are already in close touch with all the vocational work that is being done in each State in the Union. I know from my own State that the representatives of all these lines of educational work came to Washington and conferred with them.

First, I will say that the board selected as their director Dr. Prosser, who has devoted his life to the subject of vocational training.

Let me say also that the salaries of the members of this board, other than the officers, are not large, because we believed that they should occupy largely the relation toward the work of trustees of a university and that they should employ men to aid them. They have gathered around them experts in industrial and vocational work and in commercial training.

Under the vocational-education act they have approved the plan of vocational training in the respective States. The act requires each State to either create a board for vocational education or to place that special duty, through legislative enactment, upon an existing board. This, I think, has been done in every State in the Union. The Federal Board for Vocational Education is therefore organized and in touch with all the educational activities along vocational lines in every State in the Union. They are in a position to call to their air those best qualified to help in the work. They are familiar with the local institutions where training can be had and with local opportunities for employment. I think we are fortunate not to be called on to create any new agencies to handle this work, but that we have a most excellent one already in existence.

The work of rehabilitation must begin at the hospital and follow until the rehabilitated is located in an occupation. We left entire control to the Surgeon General's department in the hospital, but we provide that the vocational instruction, although the Surgeon General is supreme, shall take place in the hospital through the advisory action of the Federal Board for Vocational Education.

We felt that in the hospital it is necessary that there should be no question of the authority of the Surgeon General, yet we place with the Surgeon General's office and the admiral at the head of the naval medical service the Federal Board for Vocational Education and their trained assistants to aid in carrying into the hospital that line of vocational instruction which will contribute to the cure of the patient and also contribute to turning his mind toward future action. The representative of the Canadian Government stated that even in their trench hospitals they had pictures and illustrations of what could be accomplished by the injured who had accepted vocational training for rehabilitation. They sought, from the moment the patient in the hospital in France could begin to think, to inspire in him the hope still to do something.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Georgia must greatly differentiate between conditions in France and conditions that will surround our injured soldiers in the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, immediately upon being injured upon the battle fields of France the soldiers are taken to the hospitals, while our injured men will be brought home.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was referring to the Canadian practice, which I thought was so like ours; I was not referring to the French practice. I said that the director of this work in Canada had stated that even if the patient was compelled to wait while in France in a hospital, he was met with the suggestion of hope, and on the vessel bringing him over they had illustrations and pictures of what the injured could do, and the effort was made to substitute hope for despair.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Georgia will permit me further, the Senator suggests that this legislation is largely patterned after that of Canada. Will the Senator tell me what the nature of the board is, if they have a board in Canada, which has jurisdiction over this matter?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They have not a Federal board in Canada for vocational education like ours; no such board exists. There is, however, a special board in Canada which has charge of the work; and Mr. Kidner, who came to us, is secretary and director of the work.

Mr. GALLINGER. I asked that question for the reason that while I have no disposition to underestimate the valuable services that the Board on Vocational Education will serve in a matter of this kind, it seems to me that it ought largely to be primarily in the hands of the Surgeon General of the Army and Navy; and it is unfortunate, from my viewpoint, that some distinguished surgeons are not on the board that is going to have jurisdiction over the matter.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Dr. Billings—Col. Billings he is now—the great Chicago surgeon, has been designated by the Surgeon General, while the patients are in the hospital and before they are discharged from the hospital, to give his attention generally to the supervision of this work in the hospital. Gen. Gorgas, Col. Billings, Mr. Monroe, Dr. Prosser, and I have had a number of conferences with reference to this work. Col. Billings, while the patients are in the hospital, will be the directing force, and the Federal Board for Vocational Education, which takes charge of the patients when they leave the hospital, as the Surgeon General's work then, of course, is completed, will cooperate, I am sure, in the fullest possible way with Dr. Billings.

There was a demand from many that the jurisdiction of those charged with the vocational education should extend to the hospitals, but we concluded that the soundest view was that the surgeon must be supreme in the hospital and that the vocational board should only assist the surgeon where the surgeon asks for help. So the plan is that Col. Billings, from the Surgeon General's Office, will be the directing force of the Surgeon General's Office, and the Federal board will aid in suggestion and in cooperation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia will permit me further, I read from the bill, first, an appropriation of $2,000,000, and then it is divided up:

> For the preparation of instructors and salaries of instructors, supervisors, and other experts, including necessary traveling expenses, $545,000.

The sum of $250,000 is—> to be used by the Federal Board for Vocational Education for the purposes of this act, to wit, for renting and remodeling buildings and quarters, repairing, maintaining, and equipping same, and for equipment and other facilities necessary for proper instruction of disabled persons.

That would indicate that the first question I asked the Senator was not one without some merit—as to whether or not these men were to be collected together and taken care of. It seems a sane conclusion from the language that I have read that if $250,000 is to be appropriated for buildings and that sort of thing, the purpose is to collect these men rather than to have them go to their separate homes or to their separate communities.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I take it for granted that it would be impossible in many instances to find any facilities for their training at their immediate homes, but the opinion expressed by those who appeared before our committee and the opinion expressed by Dr. Prosser and Mr. Monroe, each of whom appeared before us, was that, so far as practicable, the place of instruction should be as near their homes as possible.

Let me illustrate. There will be a class of men who will be trained in agriculture. They might have tuberculosis or they might have recovered from tuberculosis, and it might be essential to put up away from the main buildings some class of cheap buildings for them to occupy with the benefit of fresh air. In a number of instances it is believed that it will be advisable to rent buildings for instruction in mechanical lines. Wherever that is done, the opinion is expressed that it should be as near as feasible to their homes.

Mr. GALLINGER. The difficulty will be that they will be scattered all over the United States, and while one man is near his home, another man will be a hundred miles from his home.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That would happen in some instances.

Mr. GALLINGER. It will happen in all instances.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It will happen in many instances.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me further, because I want the information; that is my only object in asking these questions. I desire to say that I did not know that the hearings on this bill had been printed, otherwise I should have examined them. I have not had the privilege of doing so, and I will make the suggestion that when committees have hearings on these important measures copies of such hearings ought to be placed on the desks of Senators.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to answer that suggestion. I did not place them at once on the desks of Senators, but I sent one copy at once to each member of the committee, and I called the attention of the Senate to the fact that the hearings were going on and were being prepared, and that we should be glad to furnish copies to them. I was afraid that if I put copies of the hearings at once on the desks of Senators they might be lost, but I requested that one copy be placed on the desk of each Senator to-day, and wherever I have been able to find a Senator who would take a copy I have handed it to him. I have asked a number of them to give attention to the matter.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no idea that there was any purpose to suppress the hearings.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There was not only no intention of that kind, but I have almost made myself a burden to Senators by begging them to read the hearings and handing them copies.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, he speaks of this work going on in the hospitals. Is that practicable or possible, as a rule?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; so Dr. Billings thinks and so the experts say, but only as a stimulus to the treatment, only along the line of using their minds and their hands as they are being treated, to the extent that the doctor approves of. I insisted, however, as one of the committee, that it must be with the doctor supreme.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, that would follow as a matter of course.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, in some places they undertook to run a dual control, with the vocational trainer not subject to the doctor. It seemed to me that it was important to provide against that, and the Surgeon General's Office objected to it. So I think we finally framed the bill with the perfect accord of both sides, and I think they found that each was so moved by an earnest purpose of service that they were sure they could work together.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Georgia if I am disturbing him at all by asking these questions.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. Because I have no disposition to do that.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, if I may make one suggestion, it appeared from the testimony at our hearings that in the case of boys who had been wounded on the fields of France and who had been carried to hospitals and then after a little treatment were taken to vessels and brought home, and where the district vocational officer could have access to the wounded soldier during his retention in hospital and on shipboard and could impress him with the idea of which the Senator from Georgia has spoken, namely, that there was a future for him and that if he would undergo vocational rehabilitation he could again become a strong man—where all this was done 80 per cent of those who came back entered the vocational and rehabilitation schools in Canada, and were successful in receiving proper treatment. On the other hand, where they were not met in the hospital or on shipboard by some one representing the vocational training organization and came back free to act as they pleased, 80 per cent went to their homes and did not embrace vocational training. That statement seemed hardly believable; and yet that is the report of the Canadian officer who appeared before us, and is one which we ought very carefully to consider. If the boy has a stimulus of the right kind, he embraces this training, while if he does not have it he goes back to his home and lapses into his old-time prewar conditions.

Mr. GALLINGER. That, Mr. President, presupposes the establishment of homes; and that, I think, is a very essential part of this scheme. If that is not contemplated, I think it ought to be.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to say to the Senator that we did not know how to distribute the fund, and simply took the lump appropriation of $2,000,000 and prorated it according to the experience of Canada. The director from Canada gave such information as he could to Mr. Prosser, and we undertook to divide it about as the fund in Canada was distributed in practice.

Mr. PAGE. I am sure the Senator from New Hampshire will be pleased with our ideas here, because the House had a bill which provided for a lump-sum appropriation of $2,000,000. We had in view the economy theories of the senior Senator from New Hampshire, the nestor of the Senate, when we made this subdivision, so as not to have any lump sum which could be promiscuously drawn upon.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And we, furthermore, provided that a report should be made every three months to the Senate and to the House with a statement of every cent expended, who was employed, and what salaries were paid.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is a very valuable provision; and, as a Senator near me says sotto voce, that is different from the way the Creel bureau and many other bureaus of the Government are being run.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We did not have that as a model before us.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very glad of that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We were not sufficiently familiar with it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Another provision is for the preparation of instructors. Who is going to prepare instructors to do this work?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We are already arranging to bring here some of those who have succeeded with the work in Canada and some who have succeeded abroad; indeed, the Red Cross and some other organizations have already been helping the vocational board prepare for the work. That question came up before our committee as to whether there was really such a thing as instructing anyone to do this special work. The best advice we could get was that it is in the nature of technical work, different from the ordinary vocational work, and some special instruction to help by leaders would be valuable and contribute substantially to the work to be accomplished. We were convinced as a result of our investigation that the plan was wise.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. How long has this system been in vogue in the world?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Only since the war began. So far as I know, prior to the war Belgium had the only institution for the vocational training of the injured with a view to their rehabilitation.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That was prior to the war.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That was prior to the war, and it was for the injured in industries. In England there was the sailors' and seamen's Lord Roberts fund that had one or two institutions with that in view; but only since the war or during this war have the nations involved in the war realized the possibilities of the number of men who can be made living, active citizens as the result of special vocational rehabilitation training who otherwise would lapse into idleness and uselessness.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia will permit me further, I have not been in the Chamber during all of the Senator's discussion of the matter, and I will ask the Senator the amount of money carried by this bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Two million dollars.

Mr. VARDAMAN. To be expended in what period?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The appropriation is to carry on the work to July 1, 1919. I had already stated—the Senator from Mississippi was not present, perhaps—that it is estimated that 10,000 men will receive the benefits of this service during that time, according to the Canadian experience.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It strikes me, Mr. President, that it is an excellent conception, and it has my approval.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The Senator from Georgia has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who is on his feet, and I will wait until he has finished.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will soon conclude.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, just one moment. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] that since this investigation commenced I have received, and I presume other members of the committee have received, numerous letters in which we were urged to add the vocational rehabilitation of the injured who were not connected with the war.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Those injured in industry.

Mr. PAGE. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say in that connection that I have a letter from the commissioner of labor of my own State and, if I may be permitted, I should like to put it in the RECORD at this point, to show that I have not neglected his request.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should be very glad to have the Senator from New Hampshire do so, because we can not build up too much sentiment in favor of the rehabilitation of the injured to please me.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I will ask that the letter be read, if there is no objection. It is a brief letter; and then I will only occupy two or three minutes more.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,
OFFICE OF THE BUREAU OF LABOR,
Concord, N. H., May 21, 1918.

Senator JACOB H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: On April 8 Senator HOKE SMITH introduced into the United States Senate a bill providing for the establishment of auxiliary workshops in different portions of the country for the cure of crippled soldiers and sailors returning from the war. It is my understanding this bill restricts the benefits to crippled soldiers and sailors injured while in service. In view of the fact that many industrial accidents occur in our industrial life, would it not be a good idea to broaden the scope of this proposed law to include the workers of the United States who are maimed and injured in industrial accidents?

Hoping that you may see your way clear to propose such an amendment to give this law a broader scope, and thanking you for past favors, I am

Very truly, yours,

JOHN S. B. DAVIE,
Labor Commissioner.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will say that I will not offer an amendment, but will submit it to the Senator from Georgia and his associates on the committee for their consideration. There is some force in the suggestion, as I look upon it.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I have prepared an amendment to be proposed to the bill including that idea and to be inserted after the word "hereof," on page 4. I did not know whether the Senator from Georgia might wish to make mention of it. I will not offer it now, but will wait until later.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, Senators will find in the hearings, in the testimony of Dr. Little, who is the chairman of the board for compensation to injured Federal employees, an amendment, carefully worked out, which covers the subject fully and extends the principles of the original bill for vocational education to the injured in industries and requires the States to duplicate any Federal appropriations. I did not advocate it and the committee did not accept it; not because there was a member of the committee who was not for it, but because we thought it would be as much as we could do to undertake just now to find teachers prepared to handle our wounded soldiers and our sailors who need rehabilitation. We thought the other was too big a work for us to undertake at once without preparation. The whole theory that you can take a man who is incapable of work and who heretofore has been allowed to go to the scrap pile, as far as industrial effort is concerned, and rehabilitate him by special courses of training is almost new, although it has been, as I have already stated, wonderfully successful, and the testimony was that 1 per cent of those who went to the front were capable of this character of rehabilitation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me one word more—if we start this bill and it is a success and they see in the different States how special training can rehabilitate the injured, whether the National Government then assumes the part of directing it or not, you will not be able to stop an immediate effort toward special training for the rehabilitation of the injured in industry. Personally I do not object to national contributions to that end; I do not object to using public funds for the general welfare.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a little while ago I was calling attention to the division of this fund of $2,000,000 for buildings, renting buildings, and some other expenses, $250,000; "for the preparation of instructors and salaries of instructors, supervisors, and other experts, including necessary traveling expenses, $545,000." In that connection I ventured to ask a question as to the preparation of instructors, just what it meant or what it included.

For traveling expenses of disabled persons in connection with training and for lodging, susbsistence, and other necessary expenses in special cases of persons following prescribed courses, $250,000; for tuition for persons pursuing courses in existing institutions, public or private, $545,000.

Now, Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia just what that means—"for persons pursuing courses in existing institutions, public or private, $545,000"?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This is what it means: It is deemed probable that in many of the States there can be found home institutions already existing which can add special courses for these men, utilizing part of their existing courses, and that wherever feasible such existing institutions can be utilized, at a less expense and perhaps even more successfully than to undertake to establish a new institution.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if the word "persons" means soldiers or sailors?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. It says "persons following the prescribed courses."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They are the only persons who are following the prescribed courses—the injured in the Army and the Navy, for whom above courses are prescribed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, Mr. President, the remainder of the fund is divided. I will not take time to read it.

I will say, in a few words, that I am troubled more particularly about the possibility of making this a workable law. I can understand how in Belgium or France, where the soldiers are being wounded by the thousand every day, they can be taken immediately to the hospitals and be given attention, medical and otherwise; and I can understand why a scheme such as is outlined in this bill would be entirely workable under such conditions. What they do in Canada, I am not informed; but it does seem to me that unless they can be gathered together in communities or in institutions in this great country of ours it will be absolutely unworkable.

Suppose we have 10,000 wounded soldiers brought across the Atlantic Ocean. They naturally will scatter to their homes unless they are halted in some way and taken to institutions. Three or four men in my little city, or in some other little city in my State, will not be able to get this instruction, I apprehend. They can not have teachers designated to go there to instruct two or three of them. If that were done, covering the entire United States, the $2,000,000 would fade away like dew before the summer sun, and really would be a bagatelle in carrying out the purposes of the act.

I am not saying this, however, in antagonism to the measure. If it can be made workable, I think it will be a very valuable thing; but my apprehensions are that when you take this great country of ours, so much larger than all the other countries that are in the war combined, with the exception of Russia, if she is in the war——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Dominion of Canada is equally as large as our country, very true—it will be a very difficult matter to reach these people, and to give them the direct instruction and aid that is in contemplation. As I read the bill and gave it a little study, that point troubled me more than anything else connected with the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to say to the Senator that we have modeled our plan almost entirely after what has proved to be a success in Canada. We have felt that our conditions were more nearly the same, and it is succeeding there, so we are assured.

Of course, the Senator is right; two or three persons in a community could not receive training. They will be classified according to the character of their injuries.

There may be an agricultural school in New Hampshire. It might be found desirable for some of them to receive their special training there. It might be that there is a mechanical institution in Massachusetts. It might be found desirable to give them training there. It might be that upon commercial lines they could be trained there. Generally speaking, the theory is to take them as short a distance from home as possible, but not to neglect the fact that they are to be given the opportunity, and we adopted the policy of striking out the provision that allowed these men to be put back under military discipline. We leave them to act of their own volition. The best judgment we could gather from the experience of the successful was that the man must want to do it—must agree to take it of his own accord. We struck out of our bill the words allowing the vocational board to order them to the school and substituted "furnish." The only restrictive power that is in the bill is this: After the man has accepted, has expressed a desire to take the training, and has entered the line of instruction he must comply with the rules, or on the recommendation of the board his portion from the allotment provided in the insurance act can be temporarily suspended. That is the sole controlling influence that can be thrown around him.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will content myself by simply observing that if the bill becomes a law I hope it will be a workable law. I will repeat what I said a little while ago, that I somewhat regret that on this board the profession of medicine and surgery is not recognized, and that whatever is done in that regard, so far as the accomplishment of this grand purpose is concerned, will have to be voluntarily contributed by the Medical Department of the Government.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. RANSDELL. I should like to ask the Senator a question, and I want to say, as the premise to my question, that I have been very much impressed by the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I have been looking into this question somewhat myself. I had a discussion with Col. Billings about it the other day, and I got the impression from section 6 of the bill and from what I was told by Col. Billings, and especially from a letter from Gen. Gorgas to the Judge Advocate General, a copy of which I hold in my hand, that this bill does not contemplate taking the charge of these soldiers out of the hands of the Army and the Navy until they have been pretty well rehabilitated. Am I correct in that?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Physically rehabilitated, but not vocationally rehabilitated.

Mr. RANSDELL. I understand vocationally, too. Now, perhaps I am wrong; but I should like to read this letter of Gen. Gorgas, addressed to the Judge Advocate General, dated April 27. To me it was intensely interesting:

Subject: Physical reconstruction of invalided and disabled soldiers.

1. In reply to your communication dated April 23, 1918, it may be stated that the Medical Department of the Army has approved the following policy for the physical reconstruction of disabled soldiers:

(a) That hereafter no member of the military service disabled in line of duty, even though not expected to return to duty, will be discharged from service until he has attained complete recovery or as complete recovery as it is to be expected that he will attain when the nature of his disability is considered. The inauguration of this continued treatment will result, during the period of the war, in the saving to the service of a large number of efficient officers and soldiers who without it would never become able to perform duty.

(b) Physical reconstruction may be defined as the completest form of medical and surgical treatment carried to the point where maximum functional restoration, mental and physical, has been secured. To secure this result the use of work, mental and manual, will be required during the convalescent period. This therapeutic measure, in addition to aiding greatly in shortening the convalescent period, retains or arouses mental activities, preventing "hospitalization," and enables the patient to be returned to service or civil life with the full realization that he can work in his handicapped state, and with habits of industry much encouraged if not firmly formed.

2. The Medical Department of the Army assumes that the care of the sick and wounded soldiers is incumbent upon the department. In accordance therewith, the department has organized a division to have the administration of the reconstruction of disabled soldiers. This division was organized in August, 1917. The Division of Physical Reconstruction has developed the machinery necessary for the special work of reconstruction, and this may be summarized as follows:

(a) An administrative personnel which includes the specia' care of disabled soldiers by the several departments of medicine and surgery, with a qualified medical officer at the head of each special department. These departments are general medicine, neurology and psychiatry, tuberculosis, heart disease, gastro-intestinal diseases, skin diseases, general surgery, military orthopedics, head surgery (including blindness, deafness, speech defects, brain surgery, plastic surgery of the head, throat, nose, and ear diseases), venereal diseases, and genito-urinary diseases.

(b) Inasmuch as this treatment of diseases and injuries embraces not only anatomical but also functional restoration, the continued treatment requires the use of physiotherapy. Physiotherapy includes such measures as hydrotherapy, electrotherapy, active physical exercises of all kinds, including military or other drill, or modified Swedish movements, and passive exercise such as massage, etc. Functional restoration also requires, in addition to what may be termed physiotherapy, curative occupation in the form of mental and manual work at the bedside and in shops.

(c) An educational department, the function of which is to develop along modern lines the personnel and equipment necessary to administer occupational therapy.

3. The administrative forces organized in the Division of Physical Reconstruction have been duplicated as the personnel, including the equipment to administer the reconstructive treatment in each general hospital where reconstruction work is carried on.

4. The Medical Department of the Army has assigned the following general hospitals for the reconstruction of disabled soldiers:

Insane: St. Elizabeths Hospital, Washington, D. C.; General Hospital No. 4, Fort Porter, N. Y.

Functional neuroses (nervous diseases): General Hospital No. 13, Dansville, N. Y.

Epileptics: General Hospital No. 13, Dansville, N. Y.

Pulmonary tuberculosis: Fort Bayard, N. Mex.; General Hospital No. 16, New Haven, Conn.

Cardio-vascular diseases: General Hospital No. 6, Fort McPherson, Ga.; General Hospital No. 9, Lakewood, N. J.

Drug addicts: General Hospital No. 13, Dansville, N. Y.

Chronic rheumatism: General Hospitals No. 6 and No. 9.

Disabilities due to being gassed: General Hospital No. 9, Lakewood, N. J.

Other general medical cases: General Hospitals No. 6 and No. 9 and Walter Reed General Hospital.

Those requiring orthopedic treatment: General Hospitals No. 6 and No. 9 and Walter Reed General Hospital.

Amputations: Walter Reed General Hospital.

Total deafness, speech defects, and purulent otitis media: General Hospital No. 11, Cape May, N. J.

Blindness or near blindness: General Hospital No. 7, Roland Park, Baltimore, Md.

Venereal disease and its sequelæ (where venereal disease is major disability): General Hospital No. 5, Fort Ontario, N. Y.

Wounds and injuries or other surgical conditions of the genito-urinary system (where the injury or wound is major disability): General Hospitals No. 2, No. 6, No. 9, and Walter Reed General Hospital (General Hospital No. 2, Fort McHenry, Md.).

Wounds or injuries involving the head, including eye, ear, nose, throat, face, and jaw: General Hospital No. 11, Cape May, N. J.

The partial or complete personnel and the full minimum equipment necessary for curative occupation is in active operation at General Hospitals Nos. 2, 6, 9, 11, and Walter Reed.

5. As rapidly as conditions permit, the reconstruction work at all of the hospitals named is being developed. More or less delay has occurred because of the difficulties embraced in the necessary construction of barracks, workshops, etc.

6. At New York, the port of debarkation, the necessary organization for the classification and rapid distribution of the disabled men from overseas to the reconstruction hospitals has been completed and is in satisfactory working condition. Like arrangements are being made for the classification and distribution of the disabled from overseas at Newport News. The division surgeons have been ordered to report the individual cases of disability who may be reconstructed now in the base hospitals of cantonments, that they may be transferred to the general hospitals where reconstruction work is carried on.

7. The above statement of the organization of the administration and the continued treatment of disabled soldiers is set forth in this connection to indicate the understanding of the Medical Department of the Army as to the authority of the department in caring for the sick and wounded soldiers and to indicate that physical reconstruction is now in actual operation.

Repetition of the statement gives emphasis to the opinion of the Medical Department of the Army that no soldier should be discharged from the Army until he shall have received the continued treatment which will entirely restore him to health, or as nearly restore him as the nature of his disabilities permit.

8. The Medical Department of the Army has within its personnel, in addition to its regular medical officers, the best qualified men of the United States in medicine and surgery, including the specialists. These are serving in the Medical Reserve Corps of the Army and in the National Army.

9. Attention is directed to the fact that to carry on the necessary treatment in an efficient way the Medical Department of he Army must have full and undivided authority over the disabled soldier during the entire period required for his cure.

Such aid as may be rendered by other Federal agencies, or by State, municipal, and private agencies in a cooperative way, will be welcome by the Medical Department of the Army, with the full and definite understanding that such aid will be rendered to the Medical Department of the Army only upon the invitation of the Surgeon General.

W. C. GORGAS, Surgeon General.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What is the date of that?

Mr. RANSDELL. April 27, 1918; just a few days ago.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Prior to our hearings, and prior to Gen. Gorgas appearing before our committee?

Mr. RANSDELL. I want to say to the Senator that I am intensely interested in this subject, and I am not trying to criticize the bill in the slightest degree.

I was invited to go out to Walter Reed Hospital the other day to see what was actually being done in one big Government institution, and there I saw a number of soldiers actually being treated, being built over, so to speak; being remade, reconstructed; and I was told by the surgeons that the plan is not to turn the soldier loose until he is made a new man. If he has lost both legs, they are going to put two new legs on him, and train him thoroughly to walk and use those legs. If he has lost both arms, they are going to put new arms on him, and train him thoroughly to use them.

One of the doctors told me of a very interesting case which he had called to his attention by a man not a soldier. A man visited him and said: "Doctor, do you see anything peculiar about me?" He said: "Why, no; I do not. What is the trouble, my friend?" He said: "I am very much interested in the work of reconstructing our soldiers, and I want you to know what has happened to me. When I was 18 years old I lost both legs, one hand, and had all the fingers cut off the other hand. You can hardly tell it, to see me walk about now." He was walking perfectly. He had one artificial hand, and the fingers on the other hand had been replaced, and yet you could hardly tell it. He said: "I have made a success of life. I am a prominent banker in my town. I have reared a family and I am taking good care of them, and there is absolutely no reason, Doctor, why a man should not be rebuilt and made to perform splendid functions in life. Few are hurt as badly as I was, with both legs gone, one hand entirely gone, and all the fingers gone from the other. I have earned a good deal more than support for my family, and I enjoy a good deal of comfort."

That was told me while I was going through the Walter Reed Hospital, and there I saw a number of the boys being trained. I saw a number of boys who had been brought back from across the water. I do not believe it is generally known, but we are bringing them back in considerable numbers already; and I talked to a number of them.

The plan is, as I understand, to have done right in the medical hospitals the kind of training which the bill before us contemplates shall be done by the vocational board.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is the point I want to ask the Senator about.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will answer the Senator.

Mr. RANSDELL. Now, please tell me where the work of the Army and the Navy ends and the work of this vocational board begins. I want that information first.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. When the physical man is cured, the work of the surgeon ends. During the progress of physical treatment vocational suggestion and vocational training is valuable. One of the difficulties that has been met in the whole effort to rehabilitate through vocational training has been the possible conflict between the surgeon and the trainer; a certain degree of mistaken desire on the part of a surgeon to do what did not belong to his province at all and in which he has had no special experience. To properly meet the responsibility of vocational training there must be a study of the whole vocational field for occupation in the country. There must be a study of the opportunity that will open to the particular man in particular lines of training. There will be required, even after he is discharged physically and is physically sound, an average of 12 months of training under vocational leaders when the surgeon has nothing to do with him.

In Canada the line of work suggested in this letter is done in the hospitals. The surgeon has control, but he has the benefit of the advice of one who knows more than he does about vocational training, and he draws upon the vocational instructor for his assistance in the hospital. The vocational instructor is given a little more authority in Canada than we give him. They say that he is to help determine, with the injured man, the line of occupation the injured man shall follow. Under our bill we leave the patient entirely under the control of the surgeon in the hospital, but we provide that the vocational board shall be advisory to the Surgeon General's Department with reference to vocational training in the hospital. The surgeon must pass upon it and determine that it is helpful toward physical restoration, and really any suggestion that he does receive from the vocational board must meet with the surgeon's approval in order to be adopted.

Since that letter was written, Gen. Gorgas, Mr. Monroe, Col. Billings, and Dr. Prosser have conferred fully over the matter. I can not agree that the surgeons are prepared for vocational training, or that that is their business. There were some men in the Surgeon General's Department who wanted to take charge of the entire vocational training and follow the injured man until they placed him in industry. To do this they first learn vocational training and quit their work as surgeons to study a different line of endeavor.

Mr. WADSWORTH and Mr. RANSDELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. RANSDELL. I was following a line of thought, and I hope the Senator from New York will not interrupt me until I get at that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will ask his question, I will seek to answer it——

Mr. RANSDELL. I will ask a question. Does not the Senator think that in the great hospitals, military and otherwise, there are exceptional advantages for grouping the men together and providing this vocational training for them which would not exist if you allow them to be discharged from those hospitals, unless you are going to establish other hospitals? Would it not be better to carry on that work just as I understand it is being carried on now at Walter Reed Hospital? I admit that some of the doctors do not like to do anything but the physical end of it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; that was not what I said. I said that some of the doctors wanted to take charge of these men, train them vocationally, and follow them clear to the end.

Mr. RANSDELL. I understand; and some of them do not want to do any of that at all, but some of them want to do all they can. Now, can we not have a cooperation of the surgical end with the vocational educational end, and utilize these hospitals? As suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, you must congregate the people—you must get them together—in order to operate successfully.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will answer the Senator, and then I will go on. I say, no; the hospital is not the place to keep them after they are physically well. The hospital involves a large expense, and will be needed for others who are physically unsound. It is a bad place to keep a man when he does not need physical attention. I say further that the surgeon is not the man to train permanently for industrial work, or for commercial work, or for any other kind of work except medicine. He has not been trained to perform that work.

This bill proposes to use the man who has been educated upon those lines, who understands vocational training, who is himself an educator. We leave the surgeon to do his work in surgery. While the patient is at the hospital, if the surgeon acts wisely, he will call on the Federal Board for Vocational Education to help him select the vocational trainers to work in the hospital; but as soon as the man is sound physically he probably will need 12 months' additional instruction in some mechanical institution or industrial institution or commercial institution or agricultural college, and the hospital is not the place to keep him at all. Besides, when he is physically sound he should move out and let those who are physically unsound take his place in the hospital.

Mr. RANSDELL. May I ask the Senator if we could not have annexes or branches attached to these big hospitals that would do that work? My reason for asking that is this. I will be very brief; I was talking to Col. Billings——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will ask me a question, I will answer him; but if he wishes to discuss the matter, it would be more agreeable to me if he would make his discussion in his own time.

Mr. RANSDELL. I trust the Senator will allow me to state my question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am always courteous to the Senator, and I insist on his treating me in the same way.

Several days ago I was talking with Col. Billings, to whom the Senator refers—and I believe he is one of the ablest men in the corps—in regard to the big reconstruction hospital which the Elks are about to build in the city of New Orleans. They are now building one in the city of Boston. He said to me: "They do not offer enough ground in New Orleans. They have only offered 10 acres." This was only last week. I do not think you have had him before your committee since then. He said: "They have only offered 10 acres, and we need 80 acres, because we need all sorts of buildings; we need shops for repair work and every kind of purpose a shop can be applied to."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One moment. May I ask the Senator to ask his question?

Mr. RANSDELL. I have stated the case.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That was not asking a question. That was making an argument, and I would rather the Senator do that in his own time.

Mr. RANSDELL. Well, all right. I am going to ask the question now, if the Senator will just be a bit patient.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have been patient, Mr. President. The Senator has no right to state that I have not been patient.

Mr. RANSDELL. All right.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have stood with him here half an hour on the floor——

Mr. RANSDELL. All right; I will withdraw that statement, if the Senator wishes. I have just had that conversation with Col. Billings, and he stated what they had in mind. Now, I ask the Senator if the War Department evidently does not contemplate, after the surgical end of the work is done, making these additions, these shops, and everything of that sort, and in that way getting a lot of men congregated together to carry on the vocational work?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I answer the Senator that they have no right to do it; that it would be a blunder to do it; and that no money has been appropriated for them to do it.

Mr. RANSDELL. Now, I ask this further question: Does the Senator think that $2,000,000 would go very far in doing this vocational work if we are going to remove these soldiers from the hospitals?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will answer that. It will go very much further than if you equip these hospitals as training shops and keep the men there, when the surgical work is much more expensive, when the appliances are much more expensive; and if you fitted them up for training shops you would have to build largely more hospitals to take care of the wounded.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, surely the Senator does not means to say that the Senator from Louisiana made that suggestion—that those men should be kept in the hospitals after they had been surgically healed?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He did. That was it exactly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not think the Senator meant that.

Mr. RANSDELL. No; I do not mean that, except that as they have been surgically cured they are trained along these other lines. That man with the wounded hand is not surgically cured until the hand is made just as good as it was originally, as nearly as they can make it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, Mr. President, that view is utterly untenable. That proposition is that the man is not surgically sound or physically sound until he has had a complete course of vocational training and has been taught an occupation suited to his new condition. Now, the Senator did mean to keep them after they were physically sound, for he suggested the building of additional shops and places around the hospital for that purpose.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is exactly what Col. Billings said.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CALDER. The Senator from Georgia has made a study of the Canadian system, I presume?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes, sir.

Mr. CALDER. From that study is he not convinced that after a soldier is cured he makes much greater progress under civilian control than under medical or military control?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thank the Senator for asking the question. The testimony from every source was that it would be better for him, even in the hospitals, that the vocational trainer should not wear a uniform; that it was a hindrance to the good work in the hospital to have a uniform on the man who was advising him what he was to do in life; that he improved very much faster under civilian leadership.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. NUGENT. I will ask the Senator if he does not think that the sooner men are taken from these hospitals, and the misery and suffering surrounding them there, the better off they will be mentally?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Undoubtedly; undoubtedly.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The Senator from Georgia will pardon me, I am sure, because I am so thoroughly in accord with him in regard to the principle of the bill, and so very anxious, indeed, to aid him in its passage. I want to ask him, however, what additional burden would be involved if the bill included those of similar status in industry?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It would depend entirely upon the scope of the bill. So far as the statistics indicate which I have been able to obtain, there are now 100,000 who have been injured in the industries who could be helped by vocational rehabilitation and training. Now, we have not the shops, we have not the buildings, we have not the machinery, we have not the experts in rehabilitation trained, ready to handle that force. I say to the Senator frankly that my hope is to pass this bill and to begin to train and increase the number and spread the places where the injured in the service can be rehabilitated; and then I have it on my heart and in my head to see this spread to the injured in industry. I doubt whether it would be wise to undertake that additional responsibility with no more preparation than we have, but I do believe that if this work is well done for those injured in military service, no power can stop this country from reaching out to all the injured in industry and giving them a chance.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If the Senator will pardon me just an instant, I am quite willing to take the view that is suggested by the chairman of the committee in that regard; but I am quite willing, too, if the committee see fit to go further with this bill and make it applicable to all those injured in industry, to do what little I can for its passage in that respect as well as in respect to those injured in the military or naval service.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me say to the Senator, if he will turn to the testimony of Dr. Little he will find as a part of his testimony in the record there is a completely formed plan of an amendment to the bill to cover the injured in industries. If the House would send us a bill going that far, I would advocate its adoption by the Senate. The House Members did not think they could carry that through, and I do not want to jeopardize this bill. I personally am intensely interested in the whole subject.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. With one further observation upon that point I will take my seat. We are bound ultimately to come to it. Ultimately we are bound not alone to rehabilitate the man who is injured in war, but we are bound as well to rehabilitate the man who is injured in industry, and the rehabilitation in each instance, while the one may be very appealing at this particular time, proceeds upon the same theory of the highest obligation that the State owes to its citizens. I would be very glad to commence right now, if the Senator from Georgia felt that the committee could and that the House could stand the burden, with the rehabilitation of men injured in industries, as well as the rehabilitation of men injured in war.

Then, let me call attention in closing to what I think is an answer to something that has been said about Gen. Gorgas's position. He was asked the distinct question in your hearings, as you will recall, in relation to this bill:

And you indorse it, except that you believe it should be more clear in certain points?

Gen. Gorgas answered "Yes."

Mr. KING. If the Senator from Georgia will yield, apropos of the question just propounded by the Senator from California, does not the Senator from Georgia think it would be at any rate going to the limit of the constitutional authority of Congress to go into the State and attempt the rehabilitation of persons who have been injured there?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We could not go except in cooperation with the State. The amendment prepared by Dr. Little is drawn upon this line. It provides for a certain Federal appropriation to be duplicated by the States wherever used. It provides, then, that the States should take the responsibility of handling the work, when the legislative authority of the State had expressed a desire to do so, and then the States having duplicated the funds received from the National Treasury, and having created a board to conduct the work, must submit to the Federal board their plan for the work, and only receive the national contribution in case it is carried into execution. So it carefully guards against any Federal action in the State except to furnish a part of the money and advise a plan.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that is a matter, though, that is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the States? Does not the Senator think, if I may be permitted to ask two questions in one, that ultimately the States will adopt some plan for the vocational teaching of those who have been injured, and that the States that are contiguous to each other will collaborate to establish some central school at which those persons who need instruction and betterment may receive all that is in store for them?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I answer both the questions. I think it is a question for the States, but I believe in the general welfare clause of the Constitution, which authorizes us to appropriate money to stimulate those things that are good and for the general welfare of the entire country. I believe in stimulating good work in the States along legislative lines by national contributions to it. I think the States, however, will take this up if we demonstrate through this bill, through the rehabilitation of the injured in the military service, that such a line of work can be done. I think the States will at once add that to their vocational educational work, and we will speedily have work of that kind done in all the States for the rehabilitation of the injured.

Mr. KING. One further question, if the Senator will pardon me. Does not the Senator think from his broad experience that generally whenever the Government undertakes to accomplish a work it does it less efficiently than individuals would do it or States, having smaller aggregations and smaller political subdivisions, could do it? Does not the Senator think in the long run, if you attempt to tax the people under the general-welfare clause to which the Senator referred, get their money into the Federal Treasury, and then filter it back to the States and the people, you get less upon the dollar than if you permitted the people to get it at home and use it at home?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Ordinarily I would say yes, but there are certain national problems that are reached, in my opinion, more effectively by national contribution and national stimulus. Just in this connection I wish to say that I believe the bill for national aid to vocational education has stimulated the thoughts of the people and has given us 25 years of progress that we otherwise would not have made toward the practical training of the average man and woman to meet the struggle of life. I know that the agricultural college extension bill, the agricultural colleges, and the agricultural experiment stations have tremendously accelerated the agricultural progress of the whole country. I believe the appropriations were wise and the legislation beneficial and a blessing to all the people of the country.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator at this point, it seems to me the measure which he has proposed is but laying the foundation for a system which he hopes to extend throughout the entire Republic for cooperation later on with the States, starting now with this little appropriation, that the sentiment may ultimately and in the very near future grow until the idea suggested by the able Senator from California will extend over the entire Republic. I agree very heartily with it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If I should reply to the Senator from Mississippi, I would say that if I unbosom my inner thought I do think so; but I do not wish by expressing that hope to frighten any of those who are supporting this measure who would hesitate about going as far as I would be willing to go in behalf of all the injured in industries.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG. Can there be any doubt whatever about the power of Congress to engage in vocational rehabilitation and education any more than to engage in scientific study along medical and surgical lines, plant diseases, and all such kindred subjects for the benefit of the people? I can not understand that there could be any such doubt.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is delightful for me at this time to hear the suggestion referred to, but this is one branch of action under the Constitution about which I have not a particle of question.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the Senator a question. The Senator made a statement, as I understood him, to the effect that he was fearful that the House would not go so far as to include in this legislation the rehabilitation of the injured in industries. Does the Senator really know that to be a fact?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I only feared to send it to them.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, why should we not amend the bill and include the injured in industries, and then if the House refuses to adopt it it certainly will go into conference, and it can be decided there. I think I have petitions from institutions and individuals within some 30 or 35 States of the Union asking that this legislation be extended so as to cooperate with the States in taking care of the injured in industries. I wondered whether the Senator really would object if this question was introduced by way of an amendment into this bill.

Further, while I am on my feet, if the Senator will just permit me, the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] referred to the question of cost of $2,000,000, as I remember. I have not a doubt in my mind that $2,000,000 will be insufficient to pay for the work intended to be done; but it will be a beginning, and as far as——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me, I think our best estimate was that it would carry us through to July 1, 1919, unless we have casualties far beyond what we expect.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say this to the Senator, that I expect it will be two or three times that amount, and I will not be surprised if it is, and even if that——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the situation requires it we want to do it.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what I was going to state. I do not care whether it is three or four times the amount, it ought to be done.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator will find a carefully prepared amendment along the line of his suggestion in the print of the bill on pages 86 and 87 of the hearings, extending the provisions of the educational vocational work under the old vocational education bill for the injured in industries.

Mr. BRANDEGEE rose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator wishes to ask me a question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator allow me to precede the question by a reference to the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think very likely it was the same expert physician who has been working down here on a commission in connection with the subject of restoring injured soldiers to good physical condition who told me the same story the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] has told upon the floor, about the man who had lost both legs and practically both arms. In his talk with me he was very anxious that while the man was in process not only of being surgically cured, but of being educated vocationally, he should still be under the jurisdiction of the Army, and should not be discharged from the Army so that he would go home and simply rely upon the sympathy of his friends, who would be glad to support him no doubt, but that he should be kept under the control of the Army where he could be systematically vocationally educated, so to speak, until he had acquired the use of his own occupation and become skilled in it. I see that Gen. Gorgas in the hearings stated:

> The general interest I had in the matter and in this bill was merely to have clear the authority of the military in military hospitals. In reading over this bill, while that was evidently the intention of the bill that the War Department should control as long as the man is a soldier, and that he should pass to some other body when he was discharged, it was not altogether clear that the vocational officers who came in would not have a certain amount of authority in the hospitals before the man was discharged. I think it is quite necessary to make it a little more clear than it is in the bill that that will be the result of the bill.

The bill on page 5, if the Senator will look at his copy, commencing on line 18, provides that—

> Whenever prevocational training is employed as a therapeutic measure by the War Department or the Navy Department a plan shall be established between these agencies and the board acting in an advisory capacity to insure, in so far as medical requirements permit, a proper process of prevocational training and the proper preparation of instructors for such prevocational training.

I wish to ask the Senator if, in his opinion, it sufficiently appears in the bill that the military is in the control of the situation all the time? It seems to me the success of this measure is dependent upon the fact that they do establish a plan upon which these two conflicting authorities may agree.

The Senator from Louisiana asked the Senator from Georgia a question a little while ago which I did not think the Senator from Georgia quite answered. The Senator from Louisiana asked him when, in his opinion, under the terms of the bill, the authority of the military authorities ceased and the vocational-board authority began.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thought I answered that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think the Senator did, at least I did not hear him.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I answered it specifically. The vocational-board control begins only after the soldier is discharged from the hospital and the Army. While in the hospital the vocational board has no control, but it is required to hold itself in readiness as an advisory board to assist the surgeon, who is all supreme in the hospital, and give him the benefit of such information and such aid as he may desire to put into the hospital vocational assistance, but the vocational representative in the hospital must not necessarily come from the vocational board. The Surgeon General's Department controls entirely in the hospital, and the vocational board is only advisory.

Since that testimony and since the paper, we have had the fullest conference between Gen. Gorgas and Mr. Monroe, and I think there is no possible doubt but the most cordial cooperation will take place, the cooperation from the board being simply advisory, the Surgeon General being absolute master. The vocational board not having the right to send a person into the hospital, but being ready all the time to say to the Surgeon General you need somebody of a certain character in the hospital, he is under you while he is there; we want to keep close together, so that we may be able to go right on with the war when he leaves you, or so that we may go right on with the good work when he comes out of your jurisdiction.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator has answered the question satisfactorily. I want to ask him, if he will permit me, one more question. Does the Senator know whether it was the intention of the Army or of the Vocational Board to go into our hospitals abroad and render this service in France as well as in this country?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is a question with the Surgeon General still. It is hoped, and it is the purpose, as speedily as possible to bring the injured home from France, unless the injury is very slight. The possible work that can be done in France we do not know; it depends upon the rapidity with which they are brought home; but it is the desire at the earliest moment possible to lay before the injured the expectation of becoming able to do something and the hope to become able to do something.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is just what this expert told me the other day. He instanced the same man that the Senator from Louisiana described. He said that man had spent his life since he had lost both legs and both hands in going around and visiting everybody who had a serious accident who was in a hospital, and he said it was wonderful to see the encouragement the sufferers obtained, who thought for the time being, when weak and discouraged, that they could never be of any use in the world again. When they saw that this man, who had lost both legs and both arms, had succeeded in life and had raised a family and could move about almost as well as a person possessing all his members, he said it was magical to see the way they plucked up and the effect it had upon their recovery. This physician also said, corroborating what the Senator from Georgia said, that it is necessary, as soon as the patient can give attention to anything, as soon as he ceases to suffer and has commenced to mend a little, that his mind should be directed to getting ready to do something, no matter how little at first; that it not only tended to prevent him from relapsing into a condition of ennui and laziness, to abandon himself to the care of somebody else, but it had a great effect in helping to ultimate recovery.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That was the testimony, and if the Senator from Connecticut had time to read the testimony of three or four of the experts he will find that is the view presented and urged most earnestly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If that be so, the thought in my mind is that it would be necessary for this Vocational Board to send its instructors into our hospitals in France, so as to present this hope to the mind of the recuperating soldier as quickly as possible.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The director of the Canadian work said that in France, even if the soldiers were there only two or three weeks after they were wounded and in the hospitals, there were pictures of wounded men who had learned how to do something ready to be shown. A man with an arm off is in the hospital. He is shown a picture of a mechanical arm which he will be able to use and pictures of men using them. The old idea of an arm that you could not tell the difference between the two is all gone. The steel arm, with screws and springs and machinery by which you turn bolts, and those fingers are made to clasp just as solidly as the original hand did, and in that shape holding just like a hand. The patient sees this steel arm working in a planing mill. He has to screw up those fingers to make them take hold of those pieces of steel, but while he does it he has just as firm a grip, and a firmer one, than he would have had with his old hand. Pictures of that sort, we are told, were put into the hospitals showing where men who had one arm and men with their legs off were doing effective work, and so on. All the way through the effort was made in the Canadian hospital in France to let the injured men see that men injured like they were had come home not all in, but had learned to still do something and be something.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator yield to me for another question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to say to the Senator I am intensely interested in this bill, and heartily in favor of it, but I want to be assured by him that there is nothing in the bill to interfere with the control of the Army and Navy surgeons in the hospitals. Am I correct in that?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Entirely so.

Mr. RANSDELL. Then if I construe the view of Gen. Gorgas correctly, that he wishes to train these men both vocationally and physically before discharging them, the bill will not interfere with that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; he has no money to do it; he has no right to teach them after they are physically sound. I know Gen. Gorgas would not try to do that.

Mr. RANSDELL. I simply asked the Senator if there is anything in the bill that would interfere with that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This bill does not stop it. In the hospital the vocational board is advisory, but I feel sure that Gen. Gorgas will not submit to that class of men who would want to take control of the whole work, but will insist that they draw their vocational teachers from the Federal board of vocational education, and that he will not seek to keep well men in the hospital, but will properly facilitate, when they are physically well, their going into industrial work.

Mr. RANSDELL. You may be correct in that. I simply want to be assured that we are not passing any law now which will interfere with that discretion on the part of the Surgeon General of the Army if he decides to act as I construe his letter to mean he will. I simply do not want to pass a law that might interfere with that discretion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I feel sure he has no such authority to-day. He could not retain a man an hour, after he was physically sound, in the hospital.

Mr. RANSDELL. Unless the man wanted to stay.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Georgia I have here the provision of the law under which action is taken to-day. It is found in the war-risk insurance act, and that is the only legislation which Congress has passed on the subject. Whatever work is being done to-day is being done under this act.

Mr. RANSDELL. Would the Senator mind reading the provision?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It can not be under that act, because there is no appropriation for the Surgeon General to do that work. The only work he is doing now is simply in connection with physical work which contributes to the cure.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator is wrong in saying there is no appropriation for this purpose. There was no appropriation in the act itself, but there has been an appropriation made for the Surgeon General's office, and the present expenses are paid from the lump-sum appropriation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There was no specific appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is right when he says there was no specific appropriation for it, but this is how the law reads:

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I remember it.

Mr. SMOOT (reading)—

In addition to the compensation above provided—

That means the monthly allowance and the insurance, which they call compensation—

(3) In addition to the compensation above provided, the injured person shall be furnished by the United States such reasonable governmental medical, surgical, and hospital services, and with such supplies, including artificial limbs, trusses, and similar appliances, as the director may determine to be useful and reasonably necessary: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to affect the necessary military control over any member of the Military or Naval Establishments before he shall have been discharged from the military or naval service.

(4) The amount of each monthly payment shall be determined according to the family conditions then existing.

Then—

Every person in receipt of compensation for disability shall submit to any reasonable medical or surgical treatment furnished by the bureau whenever requested by the bureau; and the consequences of unreasonable refusal to submit to any such treatment shall not be deemed to result from the injury compensated for.

SEC. 304. That in cases of dismemberment, of injuries to sight or hearing, and of other injuries commonly causing permanent disability, the injured person shall follow such course or courses of rehabilitation, reeducation, and vocational training as the United States may provide or procure to be provided. Should such course prevent the injured person from following a substantially gainful occupation while taking same, a form of enlistment may be required which shall bring the injured person into the military or naval service. Such enlistment shall entitle the person to full pay as during the last month of his active service, and his family to family allowances and allotment as hereinbefore provided, in lieu of all other compensation for the time being.

In case of his willful failure properly to follow such course or so to enlist, payment of compensation shall be suspended until such willful failure ceases, and no compensation shall be payable for the intervening period.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia a question before this debate is closed. It is with regard to the rehabilitation of the man injured in the industries. Does he not think that at present we are so totally unprepared in the matter of instructors that it would be impracticable to take up that work at this time?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the amendment that was prepared contemplated taking it up 12 months hence, or something like that. I do not think we are ready right now to go into it.

Mr. PAGE. One word more. Does not the Senator believe that the bill for vocational education which is now upon the statute books and with the passage of which he had so much to do is a better bill to amend, a better bill to make use of, than this bill as it is written?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am disposed to think that the other would be the simplest, and I think that within a few months after we pass this bill, if it succeeds well and we see the teachers developed, we could amend that bill and extend it.

Mr. PAGE. I am in entire harmony with the Senator from Georgia in regard to that matter. I know how his heart goes out to the rehabilitation of the man injured in the industries, but I am fully convinced that this bill can not be amended so as to give immediate effect to this plan. It seems to me that we ought not to encumber this bill with an amendment of that kind, but rather at some later date take up the original vocational education bill, which with a very little amendment can be so perfected as to include the rehabilitation of men injured in the industries. I think that is the proper course for us to pursue.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from Georgia permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I find on page 7 of the bill the following:

For preparation of instructors and salaries of instructors, supervisors, and other experts, including necessary traveling expenses, $545,000.

A little further on I find the following language:

For studies, investigations, reports, and preparation of special courses of instruction, $55,000.

Further on I find the following language:

And for the administrative expenses of said board incident to performing the duties imposed by this act, including salaries of such assistants, experts, clerks, and other employees in the District of Columbia * * * $200,000.

So that out of an appropriation of $2,000,000 for the rehabilitation of these injured soldiers, $800,000 of it is required for salaries. It seems to me entirely too disproportionate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The great bulk of the work will be the work of training the injured soldiers.

Mr. KING. Well, we have not had the advantage, of course, of the hearings before the committee; but it does seem to me that when $2,000,000 are appropriated for the rehabilitation of injured soldiers to cover one year, and $800,000 of that $2,000,000 are paid for traveling expenses and for salaries and compensation of employees, we are paying very dearly for our whistle. There is too little for the soldiers and too much for bureaus, clerks, assistants, specialists, teachers, and the multitude of parasites that hang around some of these departments ready to get a job. If I had my way I would strike out about $500,000 of this appropriation, which is to be paid to experts and teachers and these parasites, and give it to the soldiers.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator from Utah think that the teacher is a parasite?

Mr. KING. Well, I venture the assertion that when a report is submitted as to the expenses, a very large part of that $800,000 will have gone to clerks and to so-called experts, and not to real, genuine teachers, who are giving their services to this work; in other words, there will be too many bureaus and too many unnecessary employees, which is so common in governmental activities.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We require them to report in detail every three months.

Mr. KING. And unless the Senator from Georgia makes further explanation in regard to this matter I shall move to amend two of these items by reducing the amounts proposed to be paid to teachers and for experts and traveling expenses and for those whom I have denominated as parasites.

Mr. WADSWORTH and Mr. LENROOT addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia one or two questions. The word "person" is not defined in the bill in the section covering definitions, but the simple adjective "disabled" is used throughout the bill, except in one instance, where an appropriation of $545,000 is made for "tuition for persons." I want to ask the Senator from Georgia whether the omission of the word "disabled" in that single instance was with a purpose or inadvertently?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The language there is "for tuition for persons pursuing courses in existing institutions." They are necessarily those institutions.

Mr. LENROOT. Not necessarily. It might be "for the preparation of instructors."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. LENROOT. There is an appropriation of $545,000 "for the preparation of instructors," which might involve, and necessarily would involve, a course of instruction, and would come within the designation of the word "persons," unless it is qualified by the word "disabled."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If there is any doubt about that, I think it would be entirely proper to insert the word "disabled."

Mr. LENROOT. Then I should like to ask the Senator a question with reference to section 3. Section 3 gives to a disabled soldier the benefits of the provisions of this act in so far as free tuition is concerned; in other words, it gives to a disabled soldier who can not qualify under section 2 free tuition under the appropriations herein made. It would apply, I take it, to a class of persons such as chemists. A chemist, although disabled, might be fully qualified to resume his former occupation, but he might desire to study and become an electrical engineer. It would compel the Government to pay the tuition for that purpose. A teacher might be disabled, but fully qualified to resume his former occupation of teaching; but he might desire to become a lawyer, and the cost of tuition for that course of law could be paid out of the Federal Treasury under section 3. That would not be rehabilitation at all, would it, but a change of occupation?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Where the person injured has reached a condition where, even though he can do something, he can not do it well, and his condition is such that even a change of occupation is desired, there would be but few probably of that class of cases, and yet that discretion is left under the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. But is not that all covered in section 1? Section 1 covers the case where a person can not successfully continue his former occupation. Section 2 covers the case of which the Senator speaks, where a person can not continue in his former occupation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; section 2 is a little stronger than that. It reads:

Is unable to carry on a gainful occupation, to resume his former occupation, or to enter upon some other occupation.

That is a stringent provision. That man is carried on under section 2.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator read a little further?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It continues:

Or to enter upon some other occupation, or, having resumed or entered upon such occupation, is unable to continue the same successfully.

Mr. LENROOT. That really would cover every kind of case of which the Senator speaks, would it not?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I scarcely think it goes that far; but section 3 was intended, as it provides:

For the benefit of any person who is disabled under circumstances entitling him, after discharge from the military or naval forces of the United States, to compensation under article 3—

Article 3 requires a substantial injury in order to receive any compensation at all—and who is not included in section 2 hereof.

That is to say, he is a man who does not fall within the class which goes beyond this class. In section 2 occurs this language:

Is unable to carry on a gainful occupation, to resume his former occupation, or to enter upon some other occupation, or, having resumed or entered upon such occupation, is unable to continue the same successfully.

Mr. LENROOT. Does it not go so far, let me ask the Senator, as to give an education, at the expense of the United States Government, to every disabled soldier who desires to change his occupation, although he may be able to gain a full livelihood under his former occupation?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think it goes that far; but it does provide a liberal discretion on that subject.

Mr. KENYON. Does it not give the soldier a chance for a vocational education? Under section 3, if the soldier comes back, he can go to his former work, but he has a broader vision and wants to go into something else; he is permitted to do that; the Government pays for it, and the Government ought to pay for it, in my opinion, so as to give the soldier the extra chance.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He must have been injured to the extent provided in article 3.

Mr. KENYON. But he can go back to his old work under section 3, while under section 2 he can not.

Mr. LENROOT. I will ask the Senator, does he think we ought to do that until such time as we have made provision for the vocational education of industrially disabled persons, where they can not secure a livelihood at all?

Mr. KENYON. I am in favor of a provision for taking care of those who are injured in industries; and we must come to that sooner or later.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York will state it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Have I still the floor, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has no recollection of ever having recognized the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Chair recognized the Senator from New York in very distinct accents, when the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] rose, and I yielded to him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was almost an hour ago. [Laughter.] The Senator from New York has the floor.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Before I begin my remarks I desire to ask the Senator from Georgia if he intends to press this bill to a conclusion this afternoon?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to see the bill passed this afternoon unless there is some reason why we should not act upon it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I wish simply to discuss some phases of the bill somewhat thoroughly, and I desire to know what the Senator's plans are.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There was a desire to adjourn from to-day until Monday if we finished this bill this afternoon. I should have no objection to that; but if we shall fail to do so I should feel that we ought simply to adjourn until to-morrow.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator from Georgia will not press the bill to a vote to-day.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield for a question.

Mr. KIRBY. I wish to suggest, in connection with the discussion that has been going on, that I intend to propose an amendment to section 3; but if there is to be no further discussion this evening, and the bill is to go over, I should like to have the amendment printed and lie on the table.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I intend to discuss certain phases of the bill, and I merely wanted to know the plans of the Senator from Georgia. I do not want to keep Senators here unduly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would be gratified to see the bill voted upon this afternoon, but if Senators desire an adjournment until to-morrow, I shall not undertake to press a vote if Senators are not ready to vote. I shall be governed in that matter by the wishes of the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am willing to proceed now.

Mr. President, the objects of this bill must appeal to any man who has any conception of the suffering caused by this war, or any war, for that matter, and it should be a matter of great encouragement and inspiration to know that modern civilization has found ways and means of counteracting at least some of the desolation.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has given a very good description of the work that has been done in other countries, and it is to be hoped—and I am sure the hope will be realized—that this country will accomplish as much for its disabled soldiers as has been accomplished by Canada, Great Britain, France, and Italy. I am confident that we shall eventually lead the way in that kind of work, and I shall never place any obstacle in the path of an attempt, legislative or otherwise, to help our Government embark upon such an undertaking, but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Medical Department of the Army has already started on this work, and that it has in view nearly everything that the Senator from Georgia has discussed this afternoon, in so far as vocational training is concerned. It has not in view as yet, so far as I am informed, the placement of men who have completed vocational training, but it has already established at three different hospitals schools for prevocational and vocational training of the disabled.

I have here a report made by an officer of the Medical Department to Col. Billings, who has been mentioned so often in the debate this afternoon. The report has to do with the progress being made at Fort McPherson, in the State of Georgia, which Senators will remember as a well-known Regular Army post with permanent buildings and rather exceptional facilities not only for housing men who are convalescent, but for housing men who are entirely well; a post susceptible of great enlargement, and, in fact, one that has been greatly enlarged since we entered the war.

This report contains, among other things, the statement:

Lines of therapeutic work for which tentative arrangements are now being made and for which some opportunity for training now exists: Plumbing; tinsmithing and sheet-metal work; motor, automobile, and truck repairs; carpentry and cabinetmaking; wheelwright; steam fitting; steam engineering; stove repairing; painting, general carriage, automobile, and sign; barbering; meat cutting, butchering; cooking; baking; drafting; construction engineering; blacksmithing, horseshoeing, and carriage work; landscape gardening; farming and greenhouse work; tailoring and clothing repair; telegraph operating; telephone operating; saddlery and harness repair; shoe repairing; express business; postal service; commercial work, all kinds of office practice to be found at an Army post, much of it brought up to date as regards commercial practice, including typewriting, stenography, bookkeeping, finance; grocery business; general storekeeping and salesmanship (post exchange); photography; X-ray work; printing; electrical construction and repairs; undertaking, embalming, etc.; dentist's laboratory assistants.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator know how many wounded soldiers are there whom they are teaching?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think very few, because thus far we have very few wounded soldiers in this country.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And have they any force there competent to undertake that work?

Mr. WADSWORTH. My information from the Medical Department of the Army is that they are ready, as fast as the wounded men return, to proceed with this work. The Senator has asked how many wounded men are there. I do not know how many there are, but——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. May I ask the Senator how many instructors are there to train men to teach all these occupations?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will endeavor to cover that question in my remarks later on. I am very glad to say that the Medical Department for some months has looked ahead, in connection with this problem, with a degree of vision which is most creditable, and it has already planned a complete system for educating the teachers, who, in turn, are to teach the men these vocations.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him I will ask, Where did they get the funds with which to carry on this work? Under the authority of what law?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can not point out specifically what provision of law carries this particular appropriation, but it is a fact that the Medical Department now considers itself empowered under existing statutes to go ahead with this work. It has done so; it is doing so at the Walter Reed Hospital in this city to-day; it has 10 teachers out there now, already trained, who are teaching the wounded men in the hospital different trades. Incidentally three of those teachers are graduates of agricultural colleges and are teaching agriculture to those men who prefer to learn that business.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will yield again, I am not disputing the Senator's statement at all, but I can not imagine how that work can be carried on without an appropriation. There has been no appropriation and there has been no authority of law to enable them to carry on that work, and if they are doing it they are doing it without authority of law, and I imagine that it has not the scope that it has been represented by the Senator as having.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am quite certain that it has the scope that I have already recited, and even more, because another one has been started——

Mr. McKELLAR. It is very interesting if it has been, because I am sure very few people understand that that has been done.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield for a question.

Mr. POMERENE. I have known that the Medical Corps were doing some work along the line indicated by the Senator from New York, and I wish most heartily to commend them for doing it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, they thought of it months and months ago. I discussed this matter last summer with one of the greatest orthopedic surgeons in the United States, the head of a great hospital in Boston, who gave up his private business and the management of that hospital to come here to Washington and take a commission as a major. I know that he has spent months working out the very system that is now contemplated; it is on a small scale thus far; it has not been developed to anywhere near the limit which it is intended it shall reach, but the Medical Department of the Army has already installed the beginning of a system not only for surgical treatment but for prevocational treatment and vocational treatment.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. What I was curious to learn, because I am very much interested in this work, and think, as the Senator does, that it is a great work and ought to be forwarded in every way——

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is a splendid work.

Mr. HARDWICK. What I am curious to learn is how they can do this work on any considerable scale without either authority of law or appropriations with which to accomplish it? That is the reason why I have been so much in favor of the measure proposed by my colleague.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It should be remembered, Mr. President, let me say in reply to the Senator, that the cost of this work, so far as the employment of teachers and the training of teachers are concerned, if it is left to the Medical Department, will be comparatively light because many of the teachers will come from the ranks of the Army itself. Men can be detailed from any branch of the Army—the Infantry, the Cavalry, the Field Artillery, or the Engineers—to the Medical Corps.

Mr. HARDWICK. We will need those men for fighting, will we not, the way things look now?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They may be men who are partly disabled. Many of the men who could be so employed are not in what are known as the combatant ranks of the Army. Many of them have been teachers in civil life who have had some experience in technical training, and the Medical Corps can take advantage of their presence in the Army to draw them into the Medical Corps, give them finishing touches as it were as vocational teachers, and put them to work.

Mr. HARDWICK. They will need some legislation to authorize all that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No legislation whatever is desired or required for that. The President of the United States can transfer a man from the Engineer Corps to the Medical Corps without any legislation.

Mr. HARDWICK. But to provide for all these things for which there exists no present authority of law there will be needed authority of law.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think only additional appropriations are needed. I have a very clear impression, gathered from recent conversations with high officers of the Medical Department, that practically no legislation whatsoever is required, except in this respect: It may turn out that they will want to employ some civilians to occupy some of the higher grades of instructors in vocational training. I think, if my recollection is correct, they can not employ them to-day except under the terms of the civil-service law, and the salary would be limited, I think, to something like $1,800 a year, which would not be enough to secure the class of men whom they desire to employ.

Mr. HARDWICK. That might be permissible under one theory of our Government, but it does not seem to me that it comes within the scope of Executive authority to adopt all sorts of policies which ought to depend on the will of Congress and on the enactment of law.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I shall not argue that question with the Senator from Georgia; perhaps he is correct in stating that they have no authority; but it would be very strange, in my judgment, if the medical department had gone on for months and made these preparations without any authority in law. However, I contend, if they have not the authority, they should have it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think so, too; I agree with the Senator; I do not think there can be any doubt about that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And the work should be carried on under the medical department of the Army.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if I may ask the Senator a question, What department is now conducting these rehabilitation schools—the Medical Corps?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is a separate division of the Army Medical Corps which takes charge of that work.

Mr. McKELLAR. Can the Senator give us information as to that division; how they are constituted, and by what authority of law?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can give the Senator the names of some who have been appointed in connection with this work, and that brings me to observe, in reply to one of the remarks of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]—in which, of course, he uttered a great truth—that surgeons alone can not carry to perfection and to final conclusion the work of vocational rehabilitation; that the medical department, recognizing that fact, has secured the services of Dr. James E. Russell, not a physician, but dean of the teachers' college of Columbia University.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. May I ask the Senator when they secured his services?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Very recently, I believe.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Since this bill has been pending and since the hearings?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not know as to that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They did not pretend to have secured his services before that time, for he expressed his approval of this measure.

Mr. WADSWORTH. He is the dean of the teachers' college of Columbia University.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is the Senator not mistaken about the Medical Corps of the Army having secured his services? Is not that a little story that was circulated some 30 or 60 days ago, which turned out to be unfounded?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was told by the Medical Department this morning that he was here at work.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Can the Senator state by whom?

Mr. WADSWORTH. By a colonel in the Medical Corps who is, I think, very close in authority to Gen. Gorgas.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Surgeon General approve this arrangement in the Medical Department?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I assume that he would not have permitted the organization of such a division if he did not approve it.

Mr. McKELLAR. My recollection is that he regards this bill as a very proper measure, and that it meets his entire approval.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have no information as to that.

Mr. McKELLAR. And I am a little surprised to find that he is organizing a service of a similar kind in his own department.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If I may be permitted to continue, Maj. M. W. Murray, who for 18 years has had very wide experience in trade and technical and vocational education, and who—he is not a physician but a technical man—has received a commission as major, is in the department to-day in that division planning out this work.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, is it not a fact that the War Department has sent representatives over to France to study this very proposition?

Mr. WADSWORTH. My information is that they have; in fact, the Medical Department of the Army has taken the lead in this matter for many months.

Mr. POMERENE. I have no doubt about that; and while I do not have in mind the exact language of some of our past appropriation bills my recollection is that the appropriations were made in language comprehensive enough to permit work of this kind to be carried on. I know that was the thought I had in mind when the last Army appropriation bill was passed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is my own recollection; but I could not point specifically to the appropriation itself when asked to do so by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

Another gentleman, Mr. A. C. Monahan, an expert in agriculture from a bureau in the Department of Agriculture, has been secured by the same division. I understand that the functions of these gentlemen, when the scheme is finally worked out and elaborated and completed, are to be exactly what the Federal board's functions are to be; and my own judgment, Mr. President, is that it is wiser and safer to keep all this work under one head or there will be friction between two authorities if you once install a second authority.

It has been said in the debate this afternoon that the function of the surgeon will cease and terminate when the man is cured of his physical injuries and that the function of the vocational educator will commence at that point. Mr. President, my opinion is that the two can not be separated. They must be blended together; they must go along together through the man's convalescence and recovery. The Senator from Georgia has given us a most interesting illustration of how a man was taught to use an artificial hand and taught to work at a trade with the artificial hand; but, Mr. President, I venture to state that there was a surgeon in consultation all the time in fitting that hand to the injured arm and readjusting it from time to time, and that that man was allowed at first to do but very little work at a time and always under the supervision primarily of the surgeon, with a vocational educator, of course, helping, but with the surgeon in authority; and I venture to state that of the period which it will be necessary to devote to the final vocational education of an injured soldier, five-sixths of it will be consumed in medical or surgical treatment, and that by the time a man's medical and surgical and therapeutical treatment has been finished and he is called cured and ready to go out, his vocational education will have been nearly finished. In my humble judgment it is essential to recognize that fact.

It is said that this bill will not endanger a proper administration of this tremendously valuable and, I may say, even sacred work. Of course, it is not intended to endanger it, and no Senator would ever suggest that any such motive was behind it; but as a matter of proper administration it seems to me that it would be wise to put all of this work in the charge of the men who will have to spend at least five-sixths of the time taking care of the patients and whose authority must be supreme during much the greater portion of the period when the man is receiving his vocational education.

The vocational education will not all be given in what we are pleased to call hospitals. It can not all be given in the presence of suffering and anguish in the ordinary ward of a hospital—of course not—but it commences there. It commences, I am informed, at the bedside of the patient—functional training, mental rehabilitation, the injection of a proper spirit of confidence and encouragement into the mind of the patient, teaching him, if his hand or arm has been shattered, how to move the injured fingers and how to progress from day to day, so that the functional treatment gradually merges into the vocational training, and there is no point, I venture to say, where you can draw a line and distinguish one from the other; and the surgeon must be supreme during all of that period.

I think the bill is dangerous in that respect, in that it will tend to create a condition where friction will take place between the medical authorities and this Federal Vocational Training Board, whose functions are supposed to be advisory, but who, under this bill, will consider themselves authorized at least to go into the hospitals, and not only advise, if I read the language of the bill accurately, but do a little bit more than advise.

Take section 4, on page 4:

That the board—

Referring to this Federal board—shall have the power, and it shall be its duty—

Then skipping down to line 18—to do all things necessary to insure vocational rehabilitation.

If I read the English language aright, that would authorize the board to go into a hospital and insist that the surgeons shall follow along a certain line of treatment, and they can always come back to this act of Congress and say, "We are authorized to come in here and tell you to do these things." It is a little more than advisory. The surgeons, if they do not agree, of course will refuse to do it, and may adopt measures to protect themselves from interference; but it will not be a happy situation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. If that friction occurs, under the Overman Act the President would have a perfect right to devolve these duties upon a medical board, so that it would be immaterial. In other words, these are powers that any board ought to have, whether a medical board or any other board; and if friction should occur, such as the Senator suggests might occur, the President would have the right to transfer the duties to a medical board.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And in the meantime, of course, a great many persons will have suffered while the thing is being discussed and conferred about and the old game—if I may so—of "passing the buck" indulged in.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. How could Dr. Russell go in and take charge of the vocational training and put his people there without exactly the same possibility of friction with the surgeons?

Mr. WADSWORTH. But they are under the Surgeon General.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. These are under the Surgeon General the minute they go inside the hospital.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; they are not under the Surgeon General.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is not a provision in the bill that authorizes the board to put a man in the hospital. They can not put anybody in the hospital.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Well, a vocational educator ought to be in the hospital.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; but the Vocational Board can not put him there.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then the Vocational Board, to that extent, is useless.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On the contrary, it is valuable. It is in a position to advise the surgeons and to furnish, at their request, capable men to undertake this work and go into the hospitals to do the work. The surgeons are not obliged to take their recommendations; but, if they act wisely, they cooperate and draw on the Federal board for their vocational trainers. If they show the spirit that they ought to show in the Surgeon General's department—not a desire to undertake something not in their line just for the sake of doing it, but a desire to cooperate with another branch of the Government—they will say, "We need persons of a certain character, a certain character, and a certain character. Can you not recommend them?" They will then be employed in the Surgeon General's department—not by the Vocational Board—and they will be familiar with the patient and will come out and continue the work.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They could not be employed in the true sense of the term by the Surgeon General's department, because there will be no provision of law under which he could give them orders. He might say, "Get out of this hospital," but he could not make them do anything that he wanted them to do against their will in the hospital, because he would have no military control over them.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. How could he make one who was sent in by Dr. Russell do anything that he wanted him to do?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They are to take commissions.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, Russell is to be a commissioned officer!

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; that is my understanding, that they are to be officers of the Medical Service in the Army of the United States. That is the point.

Mr. McKELLAR. Officers in the Medical Department, but not doctors?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not physicians.

Mr. McKELLAR. They are just to be civilians in the Medical Corps?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the Senator think that is a matter of very doubtful wisdom?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not. I think it would be very wise in certain cases. There are certain activities of the Medical Department which have nothing to do with the personal treatment of ill and wounded soldiers, but are purely administrative duties. To those positions civilians who are not physicians might well be appointed as commissioned officers, and they have been. There are commissioned officers in the Medical Department here to-day who have never studied medicine—very few of them, it is true, but they are there nevertheless.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator recall who they are?

Mr. WADSWORTH. This Maj. Murray, whose name I mentioned a while ago, is one of them.

Mr. McKELLAR. What particular branch of the service is he in?

Mr. WADSWORTH. He is in the Medical Department, with the rank of major.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is something very unusual, because I think the rules and regulations require them to be surgeons, graduates of medical colleges.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That does not apply to the ambulance service.

Mr. McKELLAR. He may have some position in the ambulance service, but not in the Medical Department, if I recall correctly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The ambulance service is a part of the Medical Department of the Army.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is, in one sense; but I think the medical officers all have to be graduates of medical colleges.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, a good deal has been said about the system in vogue in Canada, and I venture to say that Canada has suffered from this conflict of authority in just the way that I fear we may suffer in this country. I know that the secretary of one of the Canadian governmental organizations appeared before the committee and testified to the very excellent work they had done there, and that is true. They have done very excellent work, but I venture to say that it has not been running as smoothly as it might have been had it been differently organized.

I have a memorandum here, prepared by a gentleman who studied the Canadian system. It is pretty long. I shall not read it all, but it may be well to point out two or three things in it. He says:

At least four Federal agencies in Canada are authorized to provide training for the returned soldier, viz, (1) the department of militia and defense—

Which corresponds to our War Department—

(2) the department of soldiers' civil reestablishment; (3) the board of pension commissioners; (4) the soldier settlement board. The first is the regular war department of the Dominion; the second is a civilian department of the Canadian Government recently established to control and administer some of the military hospitals which have been under civilian control since the beginning of the war; the third is self-explanatory; the fourth has been organized recently to settle and establish returned soldiers upon government land to be especially reserved for them.

I shall not go into this any further this afternoon, Mr. President. The Canadian experience has been most interesting. In a large measure it has been most successful, and yet it is perfectly apparent that starting de novo, with no experience, as all the other nations have started in this undertaking, they have made their mistakes. The hope I intended to express was that we shall not make these same mistakes of dividing authority and causing the friction which is bound to occur when one man is trying to do a thing with military authority and another man with advisory civilian authority comes in to tell him how to do it.

If the consideration of the bill is to be put over, Mr. President, I shall now conclude my remarks for this afternoon and venture to deliver some additional remarks at a later date.

RECESS.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If no one else desires to say anything on this bill this afternoon, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, May 24, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 23, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who hast ever been the inspiration of men in all the past to deeds of heroism and glory, inspire, we beseech Thee, our soldiers, sailors, and their allies to deeds of heroism and glory, and grant them a speedy and decisive victory; that truth may live and iniquity perish; that the world under Thee may have a new birth of freedom; that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth, but live a blessing to all humanity; Thy name be hallowed in every heart and home throughout the world; for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal, I may address the House for 15 minutes on the subject of the contribution of Italy to the progress of the world.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal and the cleaning up of business on the Speaker's table, he be allowed to address the House for 15 minutes on the contribution of Italy to the progress of the world. Is there objection?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I did not catch the Speaker's statement of the gentleman's request. What does the gentleman from New York wish to talk about?

The SPEAKER. About the contribution that Italy has made to the progress of mankind.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if he would not wait until we get the oil bill out of the way? It has been set down to follow the Agricultural bill, and it is important that it should pass immediately.

Mr. WALSH. Why can not the gentleman get 15 minutes under general debate from the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS]?

Mr. FERRIS. The only reason is we hope to confine the debate to the bill. I do not know that I will be able to do that, but I want to be entirely fair with the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from New York whether the nature of his remarks will be a friendly criticism of Italy or otherwise?

Mr. LONDON. The nature of my remarks will not be of a critical nature at all. To-morrow is the third anniversary of the entry of Italy into the war, and I intended to speak of the contribution of Italy to art, science, literature, philosophy, and music in as few words as one can say in 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. Still reserving the right to object, will the gentleman make his request that he may follow the oil bill?

Mr. LONDON. Of course, it would take only 10 or 15 minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. I will yield the gentleman that much. I think I will have the power to do it under the bill.

Mr. LONDON. Then I withdraw the request.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] withdraws his request, and the gentleman from Ohio asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD——

Mr. GORDON. By reproducing two editorials, one from the Philadelphia Record and the other from the Cadillac News, on the subject of the recent increase in second-class mail rates.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting an editorial from the Philadelphia Record and the Cadillac News on the recent increase in second-class mail rates. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, after consultation with the gentleman from Oklahoma, I renew my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York renews his request to address the House for 15 minutes to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal and the cleaning up of business on the Speaker's table, on the subject of the art, oratory, and so forth, of Italy. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 9715. An act extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Bayou Bartholomew, in Ashley County, Wilmot Township, State of Arkansas;

H. R. 5489. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exchange for lands in private ownership lands formerly embraced in the grant to the Oregon & California Railroad Co.; and

H. R. 4910. An act to authorize the establishment of a town site on the Fort Hall Indian Reservation, Idaho.

PENSIONS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RUSSELL. To try to get some conferees appointed. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 8496, an act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, disagree to all Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 8496, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask what the bill is. I did not understand.

Mr. RUSSELL. It is an omnibus pension bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri if he can indicate something as to the frame of mind of the House conferees on this and other pension bills? I have noticed a spirit on the part of the Invalid Pension Committee that does, I think, more credit to their generosity than it does, perhaps, to their standing as to the closeness of their scrutiny of pension bills. I notice in the other body, in passing these House bills, that their committees have not hesitated to pare down and cut out on an average over 30 House items in each of the bills from the gentleman's committee. On the other hand, the gentleman's committee has had one Senate bill before them, and they sent it out without the dotting of an "i" or a crossing of a "t," and the Senate bill does not go to conference. I do not like to infer even a criticism of the gentleman's committee. On the contrary, I should rather like to defend his committee from what seems to be an unwarranted attack on it by another body in cutting out so many of its items. Can the gentleman state whether the House conferees are going into conference really to make a fight to defend their bill, or is their action in reporting the Senate bill with no amendments a criterion? If so, we ought not to bother with the appointment of conferees.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, every Member of the House knows that conferees heretofore appointed to take charge of omnibus pension bills in conference have always contended for the House bill and, as far as they have been able to do so, got the amendments made by the Senate stricken out. The conferees will now contend for the House bill and will retain the items in the House bill as far as is possible. That is all I can state. As to the criticism that I understand the gentleman directly or indirectly attempts to make, that the House has agreed to take the Senate bill without any amendment, I will state that the first bill passed by the Senate was examined by the chairman of the Invalid Pension Committee, and he and his secretary said that there were very few items in it that were objectionable from the standpoint of the rules of the House. And at the suggestion of the chairman of the Invalid Pension Committee, the committee, by unanimous vote, agreed to report that bill to the House without any amendments, so as to avoid a conference. Now, the chairman of the committee believed that there would be very few items criticized by the Invalid Pension Committee, even if it should go to the House or to a conference, and to save time and trouble, believing that we would get very few changes in it anyway, we agreed to take that bill as it was passed by the Senate without sending it to a conference.

Mr. CRAMTON. Does not the gentleman think that a little more reciprocity would be desirable in that kind of an arrangement?

Mr. RUSSELL. Possibly our generosity will be rewarded by a like generosity of the conferees on the part of the Senate?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. What is the request?

The SPEAKER. To take this bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendments, and appoint conferees. It is a pension bill.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I have seven more of these bills in which I would like to ask the same order, if the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman any request to make?

Mr. RUSSELL. I would like to ask the same order that I have asked for with respect to this bill on seven others.

Mr. WALSH. I shall object to all at the present time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. ROGERS. To ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech made before Members of Congress by Hon. T. P. O'Connor, member of the British Parliament, on Monday evening.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech made by Hon. T. P. O'Connor, a member of the British Parliament, on Monday evening. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What about?

Mr. ROGERS. It is a speech made before Members of Congress by Hon. T. P. O'Connor at the invitation of the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary of the Interior invited Mr. O'Connor to address a meeting in the hall of the Department of the Interior. The invitation was extended to Members of Congress by Senator LODGE; Senator PHELAN, of California; Mr. GALLIVAN, of Massachusetts; and myself.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. For the time being I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee objects.

FOOD PRODUCTION.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11945. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] to take the chair in the absence of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11945, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11945, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Seventh. For enabling the Secretary of Agriculture to provide for and secure the voluntary mobilization and distribution of farm labor for the production and harvesting of agricultural crops, and to advance railroad fares and other actual traveling expenses for the transportation of such labor, upon such terms and conditions and subject to such regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture shall prescribe, $500,000, available immediately, of which not exceeding $50,000 may be expended for the payment of such administrative expenses, including such rent, the expenses of such printing and publications, the purchase of such supplies and equipment, and the employment of such persons and means, in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary for the purposes of this item. Any money received by the United States in repayment of advances made under this item may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this item; any balance of such moneys not used as part of such revolving fund shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. In carrying out the purposes of this item the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cooperate with the Secretary of Labor or any other Federal, State, county or municipal department, agency, or officer, or with any association of farmers, board of trade, chamber of commerce, or similar organization, or with any person. Agricultural labor actually employed in agriculture and needed for cultivating and harvesting crops where engaged shall not be mobilized nor transported under the provisions of this item, and the Secretary of Agriculture shall, as soon as practicable after the close of the calendar year 1918, cause to be made to the Congress a detailed statement showing as far as possible the number of persons transported and employed and a detailed statement of all disbursements under this item.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG], a member of the committee, offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. YOUNG of Texas moves to amend page 4 by striking out the paragraph.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph covers an item of $500,000 for the purpose of mobilizing the labor of the country.

I regret, Mr. Chairman, that I do not find myself in harmony with the Committee on Agriculture with reference to this particular item. I do not think there is a man on this floor that understands the seriousness of the labor question any better than I do as affecting farm labor. It is going to be a serious question as long as this war continues, where the young men are being taken from the farms, as they are from the industries, to help fight this war. In my judgment the appropriation of $500,000 for the purpose of mobilizing farm labor, instead of adding to the solution of the problem, will simply complicate the problem.

Farm labor as a rule is a fixed labor during a period of time. You take it in my section of the country. In the great demand for farm labor, beyond the proposition of the men who are actually engaged in making the crop, we have two periods. The spring period covers some 30 to 60 days, where the extra amount of labor is needed for the hoeing of the cotton crop and the corn, and then along in the fall season, when the gathering of the crop is on. It is a long, hard period of labor to save the great cotton crop of the South. Gentlemen from the grain belt of the country have their busy period at the harvest time of grain. I know what happens in my section of the country when the cotton crop is ready to be gathered in the fall.

Men in that section of the country who have grown great crops and need surplus labor to gather these crops know better than the Secretary of Agriculture can possibly know where to find that surplus labor. They are men who are alive to their situation. They are men who know the labor that they need on their respective farms in the harvest time. They are not asleep during the time that they do not need the labor, but they are looking out for where they will have this labor at the proper time. So they try from year to year to keep in mind the proposition of the number of men they are going to need, and they locate this surplus labor, and at their own expense they go and get this surplus labor and bring it to their respective farms and keep it there by paying the wage scale that is necessary to be paid in order to save this great crop.

Now, here is what will happen: If you enact this bill into law and offer to pay in our section of the country railroad transportation to this surplus labor, you are going to have this labor riding the trains from field to field instead of being engaged in harvesting the crop. Now, when a farmer goes out after surplus labor he pays these expenses himself in order to get these men to respond, and he is going to see to it by paying the proper wage that these men are kept on the farm when he at his own expense brings them to that farm.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that we have just the same sort of experience that he describes in my State. The farm laborers are being taken away in the manner he has mentioned, and the labor is being taken from the coal mines in the same way, so that we have a lessened production of farm products and also a lessened production of coal from the mines.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. That is true all over the country. One of the great difficulties in my State is that high wages are being offered in these shipbuilding yards and other industrial centers, which put out flaming advertisements and so draw away the labor that we need to make these crops. The men go, and then frequently find that the extra expense eats up the high wages paid them, and that they could have done better at home on the farm.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas. I do not take exactly the view that he seems to take of this matter of the mobilizing of labor and of the transportation of labor from one point to another. I am inclined to the opinion that that is a necessary and essential activity at this time. I oppose this appropriation, however, because of the fact that it provides a new agency to do a work which is already under way completely and, in my opinion, wisely organized. The Department of Labor has a very considerable appropriation, and is, I think, asking for a deficiency appropriation which will undoubtedly be granted, under which it has organized, with great care and, I think, with considerable skill, a labor agency having its branches in every State and in every community in the Union. They are asking for that organization $2,000,000 for the coming fiscal year. Their plan and purpose is to organize with a view of providing labor for all purposes directly or indirectly connected with the carrying on of the war and for the production of all those articles, including foodstuffs, necessary for the war.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. KEATING. I think the gentleman is perhaps in error when he says that the Department of Labor is planning to handle labor for all purposes. As I understand it, there has been some sort of understanding between the two members of the Cabinet—the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Labor—with the approval of the President presumably, by which the Department of Agriculture is to look after agricultural labor and the Department of Labor after all other branches of labor.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to my friend that we have had a long and a very interesting hearing on this subject with the gentlemen of the Department of Labor who have charge of this work. That hearing has just been completed, and their plan and purpose is to provide labor for all purposes—agricultural, industrial, governmental, and private. It is true, as my friend has suggested, that the Secretary of Agriculture—I presume prodded into it, if I may use that term, by some overzealous, well-intentioned people in his bureau, who, like the overzealous people in all bureaus, always hanker to handle everything in sight and a little more—has been persuaded into the notion that his department might properly handle the labor situation so far as it concerns agriculture. I think it is also true that the Secretary of Labor, a good-natured gentleman, as my friend knows, and very efficient, may have been persuaded not to be overinsistent in regard to having his organization cover the entire field. I think it is all a very great mistake.

Here is one of the most flagrant illustrations we have had in a long time of the tendency and disposition to duplicate activities. It so hard for any one of these Government departments to let go anywhere to allow any other department to have anything to do with any matter that is remotely connected with their particular line of activities. Why, sometimes these Government bureaus are scarcely on speaking terms, except in some cases where, fearing too much of a conflict, they may come together, as in a case of this kind, to secure an amicable arrangement, which in this case is not wise. It is not wise from the standpoint of the Agricultural Department and it is not wise from the standpoint of the people of the country who pay the taxes.

Now, let us look at the labor situation. One of the greatest difficulties we have had up to this time in the matter of mobilizing labor, in the matter of securing a sufficient supply of labor where most needed, has been due to the fact that the Government departments themselves have been bidding against one another. They have actually been sending the agents of one department into the works and activities of another to persuade men to leave one class of Government work to become engaged in another, and those very activities of the Federal agents have themselves had a good deal to do with the very unfortunate changes, the shifting, the frequent turnover, a loss alike to the country and to the men themselves, that has occurred since the beginning of the war and in connection with war activities. There is nothing so important as this, that one agency shall survey the entire labor situation and do their best to provide for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that his time may be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I want to see if we can agree on time for debate on this paragraph. It is the last paragraph in the bill, and I would like to conclude the debate as early as possible. After consulting with gentlemen who want time, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in 50 minutes, 25 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] and 25 minutes controlled by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in 50 minutes, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] to control 25 minutes and he the remaining 25 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman from Wyoming yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SHERWOOD. How much would be saved to the Government if this amendment were adopted?

Mr. MONDELL. That is a difficult question to answer. If this amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG], which I am supporting, were adopted, I believe that there would be a great saving in money, and I am sure there would be very much better service to the country.

As I was saying when my first five minutes expired, there is nothing at this time more important than that all of the labor of the country shall be mobilized to be used in the best possible way, under one head and agency, under an organization that can survey the entire field, the field of Government activity, the field of private activity, Government work, general manufacturing, and the field of farm production.

By so surveying the field they can determine wisely where labor is most needed and make proper provision for it. Unless we do that we will have endless conflicts; we will have the Agricultural Department bidding for labor against the Department of Labor; we will have the Agricultural Department going into the manufacturing sections trying to persuade men to go to the fields when they are needed in the gun factories. We will have the Department of Labor going into the agricultural sections endeavoring to persuade men to go to the powder factories. We will have duplication of work, of effort, confusion, and failure to secure that complete coordination of all the activities of the Government and people that are so tremendously essential at this time.

It is true, I think, that the good-natured Secretary of Labor agreed that he would not protest against this division, but I am confident, although I never talked with him about it, that he did not do so in the belief that it was a wise thing to do. I am inclined to think he did it out of good nature, I am sure, because he must know that only through such a marshaling of the labor forces of the country under one agency, as is proposed to be done through the agency they have organized, can we avoid conflict, duplication of effort and of transportation, the shifting of labor hither and yon without regard to the relative needs of various classes of industry, and all of the extravagancies and waste that are common in the duplication and confusion of activities.

If this $500,000 goes into this bill I suppose the Committee on Appropriations will feel called upon to reduce by like amount the amount asked for by the Secretary of Labor. But even if that is done there is bound to be extravagance, there is bound to be waste, there is certain to be confusion. Duplication of effort is inevitable, resulting in failure to secure the very best possible results, both from the standpoint of labor and the standpoint of the Government and people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL].

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 19, after the word "agriculture," strike out all down to the word "engaged" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and all labor under contract for the performance of service as agriculturists or farm laborers."

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment which I have offered is to accomplish what the framers of this act evidently intended should be its effect. But an examination of the language used shows it does not carry the legal effect contemplated.

On page 5, line 18, we find this provision:

Agricultural labor actually employed in agriculture and needed for cultivating and harvesting crops where engaged shall not be mobilized nor transported under the provisions of this item.

I take it that the committee intended by this language to withhold authority to disturb labor already devoted to the production of farm products. But the language used, when considered in the light of its legal significance, lodges in the Secretary of Agriculture a discretion in determining whether or not labor actually employed in agriculture is needed for cultivating and harvesting crops.

In my judgment it is unwise to place such power in the Secretary of Agriculture or his appointees, who will really be charged with the enforcement of this act. I have great confidence in the officials of the Department of Agriculture. I would not for a moment question their good faith, and I appreciate as much as anyone the value of the great work being done by that department for the development of the agricultural resources of the Nation—a work that is not only of transcendent importance in the present crisis confronting the country, but which means so much to the permanent prosperity of our people.

I am not unmindful of the splendid service that is being done by the Committee on Agriculture under the leadership of its honored chairman, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], and the able and patriotic gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER], who is in charge of this bill. But as a Representative of a great agricultural community I declare to you that the section of this bill now under consideration, if passed in its present form, is fraught with possibilities very harmful to the agricultural interests of the State of Alabama, as well as many other States of the Union.

The amendment I have offered strikes out the clause leaving it discretionary with the Department of Agriculture to decide whether labor actually employed in agriculture is needed and unequivocally excepts such labor from the provisions of the act. I am perfectly willing to consent to any activities on the part of the Department of Agriculture, or anybody, that will increase the supply of labor to be devoted to agricultural pursuits, and I am more than willing that any labor not engaged in such pursuits and that can be spared shall be mobilized and put to work on the farm.

But surely it is unwise to spend money and organize a department force to stop any man who is already actually employed in agriculture. No one engaged in such work should be disturbed. Let any man who can come forward with a plan to increase the labor, but let us not disturb those already at work.

My amendment also provides that all labor under contract to perform service as agricultural workers shall not be mobilized or transported. Surely there can be no valid argument against this. In the section that I represent the laboring class as a rule are not in financial condition to respond in damages in a civil action for breach of contract. Again, the courts have practically held that there is no remedy by criminal prosecution against those who enter into contract and obtain supplies and other valuables and refuse to perform their contracts or pay for such supplies. To meet these conditions statutes have been passed in Alabama which penalize any interference with persons under contract to perform services for another. This is the only practical protection to be found, and to disregard it would demoralize farm life and farm activities to an extent absolutely destructive in its results.

Only recently in my State and others adjoining it agents of the contractors who are doing the work of development at Muscle Shoals were engaged in the work of recruiting labor under contract to work on farms; and when the local authorities sought to suppress such activities some one connected with the War Department furnished what was supposed to be a legal opinion to the effect that such agents could continue their work in contravention of the statutes of the State and in disregard of such laws as well as the contracts of parties interested. These agents were displaying badges and cards signed by officials of the War Department in their effort to disregard the rights of the citizens of my State. I wish to say in this connection, to the credit of the higher officials of the War Department, that when they were acquainted with the practices being indulged in by these agents all such authority or instructions were withdrawn and such activities terminated. I mention this not in criticism of the War Department or its efforts. I know the difficult and delicate task that confronts them, but I refer to this to show how serious has become this question of interfering with farm labor in my State, and the conditions there are typical of conditions in many other sections of the country.

This is the most important season of the year to our farmers. To disturb their labor now would in many cases result in the complete loss of what has been done during the preceding months of the year. It does not matter that the bill provides for voluntary mobilization. There is a class of laborers in my section to whom free transportation constitutes an overwhelming allurement. Members here who know these conditions as I do will attest this. Any of you who ever saw a negro excursion can understand my meaning. Just let them hear when at church on Sunday that somebody is ready to furnish them transportation across the country to engage in some new kind of work to which they are not accustomed, and they will not stop to inquire what awaits them at the other end of the line. To them it would mean a joy ride, and on Monday morning plows would be stopped and the farmer left to search in vain for new men to take the place of those departing.

If my amendment is adopted it will at least minimize the danger involved in section 7 of this bill, and I earnestly urge that it be adopted. It will only prevent the mobilization of labor actually employed in agriculture or under contract to perform such service, and nobody ought to object to it, whether he favors striking out the section or not. It preserves the true plan for bringing about increased production, and that is to leave all who are already engaged in agriculture to continue their work, and it recognizes the validity of contracts for agricultural service. It is the only way to cooperate with the farmers in increasing their usefulness to the Nation.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. OSBORNE].

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a few observations on the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. RANDALL] to the Agricultural bill, which under the rules will probably be voted on in the House without further debate. The amendment is as follows:

Page 2, line 2, after the figures "$6,100,000," insert: "No part of this appropriation shall be available for any purpose unless there shall have been previously issued the proclamation authorized by section 15 of the act of August 10, 1917, entitled 'An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the transportation of agricultural products, such proclamation being the prohibition of the use of foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds in the production of malt or vinous liquors for beverage purposes."

The proclamation referred to is that provided for within the discretion of the President in section 15 of the act of August 10, 1917, in the following language:

Whenever the President shall find that limitation, regulation, or prohibition of the use of foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds in the production of malt or vinous liquors for beverage purposes, or that reduction of the alcoholic content of any such malt or vinous liquor is essential in order to assure an adequate and continuous supply of food, or that the national security and defense will be subserved thereby, he is authorized, from time to time, to prescribe and give public notice of the extent of the limitation, regulation, prohibition, or reduction so necessitated.

Mr. Chairman, I voted for national prohibition, and if the plain proposition of war-time prohibition were to be presented to Congress with an equitable provision for compensation to those whose property was to be commandeered or rendered valueless, I would vote for it. Congress, however, believed it wise as a war measure to place this power, along with other sweeping powers, in the hands of the President. Since the 10th of last August he could at any time have limited, regulated, or prohibited the use of all food materials in the making of beer or wine. He has limited and regulated, but thus far he has not prohibited. Why he has not prohibited I do not know, but it is to be presumed that he has reasons connected with the conduct of the war, and which he deems sufficient, which have caused him to withhold the exercise of the extreme limit of his power for the present at least. It is possible he may have taken into account as a single item that the entire wine-grape crop of the United States is now well along in growth, in some parts of the country approaching maturity; that the crop is so large that a very small percentage of it could be utilized for food even if transportation could be provided, which it could not, and that hundreds of thousands of tons of such grapes would not be saved for food but would decay on the vines, while the farmers and horticulturists who produce them would be plunged into unmerited distress. I do not know that the President has taken this feature into consideration. It is only one of many problems that confront him in the execution of section 15.

If Congress had not already placed this important matter in the hands of the President, I think I could support the object desired to be obtained by the amendment, with just provisions against confiscation. But as Congress did place this power in the hands of the President, and as he has already exercised that power in part, and may exercise it to the limit at any time, and as he probably knows better than anyone else how such action would fit in with the general war program, I am unable to see how it can be summarily withdrawn in the way that is proposed without incurring the just charge that Congress is distrustful of the President and lacks confidence in the way that he may discharge duties that it has already intrusted to him.

I am sure that my colleague would not intentionally propose legislation that would assail the integrity and dignity of the President; but I believe that in this instance he has been carried away by his zeal for the cause of prohibition, of which he is so distinguished an advocate, and that his amendment does fairly bear that interpretation.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OSBORNE. I have not the time to yield. The amendment confronts the President with this bald proposition: Unless he issues a certain proclamation declaring a certain line of governmental action, as to which by law he has been given discretion, such action to be of a certain specified kind and without reference to his own conviction as to its value as a public policy—if he does not take this involuntary official action he shall be deprived of the use of another act of legislation which he may consider of value to the country and to himself as President in the discharge of his official duties, namely, the food-production bill.

I think that this is a moderate and fair statement of the proposition. I ask if it is a moral and dignified position for Congress to take? Can Congress consistently with its own dignity propose to the Chief Executive to bargain as between legislation? Can it ask him to take certain Executive action promising him as a reward certain other legislation that he may desire? Nay, we go further in this amendment. We place before the President a threat and an ultimatum: That if he does not do a certain thing, which he may believe is right or which he may not believe is right—it does not matter—Congress will retaliate by depriving him of certain other legislation which it believes he desires.

Who desires to confront the President of the United States with this ultimatum? What will be his reply to it? Do we as Representatives in Congress feel that in justice to our own sense of dignity and responsibility we desire to be recorded in favor of presenting to the Chief Magistrate a proposition, however worthy its intent, in such an unfortunate and indefensible form? I certainly do not, and when the roll is called I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN].

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I have sought the opportunity to address the House for a few moments in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG], with the hope that I may contribute some information that I think should be considered in connection with the proposition now before us.

No one realizes more than I do the seriousness occasioned the farmers of the country on account of the scarcity of available farm labor. I stand ready and willing to do everything that I can to relieve that situation, but I do not believe that the method provided in the bill and which the amendment of the gentleman from Texas seeks to strike out would, if left in, accomplish any good purpose. The provision of the bill, in short, which is sought to be stricken out, appropriates $500,000 to be used by the Secretary of Agriculture in mobilizing farm labor. In these times of stress, when everybody is being taxed and called upon to buy liberty bonds and contribute to the Red Cross and other worthy causes in connection with this war, we ought not to appropriate these large sums of money for purposes which are of doubtful accomplishment. At any rate, something like $3,000,000 have already been appropriated since we entered this war to enable the Department of Labor and the Secretary of Agriculture to mobilize the labor of the country; and now this seeks, it seems to me, a duplication and is therefore without any real justification. I therefore feel constrained to support the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

May I mention another thing? While many of the boys from the farms have answered their country's call, yet I am inclined to think that that is not the only reason why farm labor has become so scarce. In some sections of my part of the country I am sure that much labor which might be available for farm work has, on account of the high wages paid, been attracted to private industries—coal mining, zinc mining, and governmental work. I am informed that in the coal and zinc mining sections of my country labor may earn anywhere from $4 to $9 a day. Where that condition exists it will always be difficult to get farm labor. So much for that.

What I wanted to specially call your attention to, gentlemen, is a statement I heard made on yesterday evening. I was present and heard an officer in one of the departments of the Government make a statement which in many respects was startling to me in regard to the labor situation generally. It was in substance as follows:

> We have made an investigation and have found that since we went into the war 40 per cent of the labor of this country east of the Mississippi River has been continually traveling upon the railroads, going from place to place.

To me that is a very startling statement, and I want to repeat it, that 40 per cent of the available labor east of the Mississippi River since we entered the war, instead of being engaged in helpful work, has been continually traveling upon the railroads. He was asked what he meant by that, and he said that 40 per cent of the labor was moving from one place to another continually, and therefore not engaged in actual work.

Another statement he made ought to be of interest to the House. He said that the different departments of the Government had mobilized certain labor at Baltimore, at Norfolk, and at one or two other points, where the Government is very greatly in need of labor; that when the Government needed labor down at Muscle Shoals to build the Government nitrate plant, instead of going out in the country and mobilizing the labor, gathering it up at other places, they went to those points where the Government had already the labor mobilized and employed, and offered an advance in wage, and thereby induced the men to quit there and go to another place to work. This deplorable condition is, I think, due very largely to the undesirable system of letting contracts for Government work on the "cost-plus" plan. The contractor is not interested in the price which he pays for labor, for the more he spends the more he gets. There can not possibly be any stability of labor or wage standards fixed in this country if the Government permits these methods to continue. The labor markets will be demoralized and prices of all things will be thrown out of joint, and the mobilization of labor will be an impossibility under such conditions. This statement was made yesterday in my presence by an officer, and a high officer, too, in one of the departments of this Government. I do not believe that that condition should be permitted to exist. I do not believe under these circumstances that the Agricultural Department can render any very great service to the country by attempting to mobilize this labor. Therefore I agree entirely with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG] that this is an unnecessary expenditure and would be a waste of money, and that if we will let the farmers of this country alone they will be able to take care of the situation very much better than we can.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

By unanimous consent, Mr. HAMLIN was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this amendment with a great deal of satisfaction. I voted also for the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL], and I do not care very much which way it works. If it works to defeat all of these appropriations I shall feel very well satisfied. If it works to bring forth the desired proclamation by the President, I would perhaps feel better satisfied still. If this bill could be amended further, it might possibly be brought into condition so that some of us who have hesitated about voting for it under any circumstances would be ready to ratify it; but, as a matter of fact, it does not make very much difference whether those who are opposed to the bill vote for it or not, because it will be carried. In this Congress it seems necessary only to label a bill an emergency war measure to get the Members of the House to fall over each other in their eagerness to vote for it, in order to show that they are ready to support the war. It would be better to first examine the bills and determine whether in fact they will support the war. Here is a paragraph appropriating $500,000 to duplicate a service already being performed, and which can be better performed by the Department of Labor, and the eloquent gentlemen who have preceded me, to say nothing of my poor efforts, have been unable to get order in the House at any time they were speaking.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. The difference between the work performed by the Department of Labor and the Department of Agriculture is this: The Department of Labor has control of the whole labor situation throughout the United States. The Department of Agriculture confines its activities to the labor propositions in agricultural sections, and this is not a duplication of work. On the contrary, it is by cooperation and full agreement between the two departments.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If my friend will pardon me, I think that is just exactly the reason why this provision ought to be stricken out. This whole matter with reference to labor ought to be under the control of one department, so that it can be harmonized, brought together under some definite plan or rule; otherwise we shall have one department pulling one way and another department pulling another way, and, worst of all, in these days when we need every cent we can raise, we will have a duplication of expenditures. Gentlemen proceed with the bill as if there were no limit to the funds in the Treasury and no limit to the resources of the country.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. Does not nearly every State in the Union, so far as the gentleman is acquainted with the situation, have a farm-labor bureau?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. Is not the labor question, so far as farms are concerned, pretty well taken care of by those State bureaus?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think it is.

Mr. BOOHER. Then what is the necessity for this expenditure of $500,000?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have been trying to find out what would be the necessity for it and the necessity for a good many other things in the bill. That seems to be something nobody can find out. We have spent several days on this bill and no one has attempted to tell why we should expend half a million of dollars for this purpose. This is not supporting the war. It is taking away from the war one of its chief supports—money.

Mr. COX. Will it not give a lot of free rides?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And some more employees?

Mr. COX. Sure.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. We create another department and they will have places for some more employees down here—that is, they will have opportunity of appointments. We will have no room for them otherwise, for they are in each other's way now. But, gentlemen——

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. MONATGUE. Do I understand from the gentleman that the Labor Bureau already covers this line of activity?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Covers all lines of labor activity, and is preparing a plan—I do not know whether it is fully completed, but this bureau is planning for the mobilization and organization of all the labor of the country.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Therefore the gentleman's argument is that unification of one department is easier than coordination of two departments.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is stating the case briefly better than I did in many words. As he states it it becomes self-evident. In fact, the principle is axiomatic. I hope this item will be stricken out, and I wish it had been possible to amend the other paragraphs so as to lessen about one-half the appropriations which they carry. But the time will come, I will say to the Members of the House present and the few who are willing to listen to such remarks—the time will come before this war is finished when Members of the House will be ready to listen to amendments to cut out unnecessary appropriations, even though the item be no larger than $500,000, which once looked like a great sum to us. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY].

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I have observed that whenever a bill dealing with agriculture is to be discussed all shade-tree farmers rise. [Laughter.] It is refreshing, therefore, to get three minutes for a real farmer to talk about this measure. [Applause.] Now, this section ought to be stricken out. I know something about farmers and farm labor. To start with, you can not mobilize farm labor except to get it off the farm. Any man living in a town and without money enough to pay his own transportation, or mind enough to know what he wants to do, will not live and work on the farm. He will live only where there is an alley in which he can loaf. So, to talk about the mobilization of farm labor in the cities to supply farmers with labor is idle, and anybody who would know a cow from a horse, unless the cow was dehorned, knows it. You can not get farm labor that way. But I will tell you what you can do. You can mobilize farm labor at least in the section from which I come and get rid of it very easily. The Government is doing that now. Anyone who knows a negro—and I do—knows that he would quit his family and crop any day if you will give him free transportation. He does not care where he is to go, nor does not expect to work when he gets there. He travels to broaden his mind and for his health. I know from personal experience. I spent a month in one parish in Louisiana last fall. I saw a plantation with 2,500 acres under cultivation, as fertile land as the Lord ever makes. On that plantation there was one old negro man and one old negro woman. That was the entire labor on that plantation; yet the Department of Agriculture here has been asking appropriations to put Government land under cultivation in order to increase food production. At the same time governmental agencies are stripping the farms of labor from land already cleared, with houses already built, and, in many cases, with stock on the place. These lands are lying idle now, thousands and thousands of acres, because agents from Government plants have taken away the labor. In my section they are importing Mexicans now to take the place of farm labor that the department has mobilized and carried away, and if this section stays in this bill we face ruin. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, exactly as stated by the gentleman from Wyoming and other gentlemen, the result will be the duplication of effort. The Department of Labor now is doing the very thing that is proposed to be done under this amendment. Every State in the Union is short on farm labor, and the only way that anything can be accomplished is to strip one State of its labor to supply another State. The amendment provides for transportation. The I. W. W. would prefer to ride in Pullman cars rather than to pay fare or to steal their rides. If this appropriation is made it will not only give a few of those people a ride in a Pullman car, but fat jobs to a number of Democrats. The result will be that the loafers and the driftwood that is floating over the country in the way of labor will be supplied to the farmers, and, as stated by the gentleman from Arkansas, nothing can be accomplished by that kind of labor. What is needed on the farm is skilled labor, and we are not going to get it under this provision. The Secretary of War now has the power to furlough and skilled farm labor can be provided for, which is, of course, much preferred over what is suggested in this bill.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used one minute.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT].

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to talk upon this particular section; but, as this bill is designed to increase food production, I do want to make a suggestion to this administration as to how it may with certainty increase food production. It has become a trite thing to say that food will win the war. That is generally accepted as true. Many schemes and much legislation have been resorted to in order to increase food production. Some of it seems to be very chimerical, and the arguments upon the floor here so far demonstrate that a good deal of it has been abortive. Now, we have in this bill an appropriation of $6,100,000 to increase food production by "educational and demonstrational methods." It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that instead of spending $6,100,000 for educational and demonstrational methods, for a lecture bureau, that this administration should profit by its experience in the accomplishments of the Reclamation Service. Here is your future increase of food production, through the reclamation of the arid lands, the arid lands in the West, amounting to over 17,000,000 acres. Last year upon the Government reclamation projects in the West there were raised some $50,000,000 worth of various kinds of food crops—alfalfa, wheat, oats, barley, and other food products—necessary for the winning of this war. Fifty million dollars' worth were raised upon 1,000,000 acres of land, $50 an acre, exceeding by something over $30 the average yield upon all farms of the country, as shown by the last census report in 1909. Instead of spending this $6,100,000 in "educational and demonstrational methods" put that money into the reclamation of those arid lands. That amount would irrigate easily 120,000 acres. These 120,000 acres if put into wheat would produce from 30 to 50 bushels per acre; in fact, I have known of one farmer on irrigated lands, C. W. Mallett, of Ontario, Oreg., who produced on a small tract 90 bushels of wheat to the acre. He told me while he was here in Washington this spring in the interest of the Warm Springs project that he frequently raised 60 bushels of wheat to the acre on his irrigated farm in Malheur County, Oreg.

But to be conservative, I shall only claim from 30 to 50 bushels of wheat to the acre. In this case $6,100,000 expended on reclamation, every dollar of which would be paid back into the Treasury, would produce from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000 bushels of wheat yearly. Five million bushels of wheat is about one-twentieth of the wheat we have shipped to our allies in the last year. There are a number of projects in my district that have been investigated by the Reclamation Service and that have been investigated by the State board which we have for that purpose. Many of them could be put in operation next year. The Government has spent $50,000 and the State has spent $50,000 in investigating these projects. Some of them have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior; they have been approved by the State board. But you say, "Why do you not resort to the reclamation fund?" We can not do it. We have had representatives from Oregon, together with the congressional delegation, presenting this matter to the Secretary of the Interior. The reclamation fund is a limited one, and it has been the policy of the Secretary of the Interior not to venture upon any new projects until the present projects are completed and paid for. So there is no money with which to undertake any new projects, unless we can get an appropriation from the Treasury.

The money appropriated in this bill to increase food production by the eradication of ticks, $1,058,995, and the $6,100,000 appropriated to increase food production by "educational and demonstrational methods" is sufficient to supply water to the Suttle Lake irrigation district, in Jefferson County, Oreg., which could be made to produce next year more than 100,000 bushels of wheat, together with other food products. It would also, in addition, supply sufficient water to irrigate the Warm Springs irrigation district, in Malheur County, Oreg., where some 12,000 acres are now partially irrigated, which, together with 10,000 more, could be fully irrigated next year. The Suttle Lake district and the Warm Springs district could be made to produce next season more than 1,000,000 bushels of wheat. This amount would also, in addition, put under water the Owyhee irrigation district, in Malheur County, Oreg., which in the next year would produce 1,500,000 bushels of wheat. It would also, in addition, serve water for the North Unit project, in Jefferson County, Oreg., an irrigation district consisting of 100,000 acres. This 100,000 acres could be made to produce within two years from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000 bushels of wheat or its equivalent in alfalfa or other food products.

These projects have been thoroughly investigated by State commissions and also by the United States Reclamation Service. They have voted bond issues, which have been reviewed and approved by the State commissions and the Supreme Court. But they have been unable to float their bonds on account of the financial demands of the war. The owners of these lands have shown their faith in their productive capacity by voting almost unanimously to mortgage their lands to secure these bond issues which I have referred to. They are feasible, practicable projects, and beyond question would increase the food supply in the amounts which I have mentioned, amounting to over 7,000,000 bushels of wheat yearly or its equivalent in other food products. When we consider the certainty of this increased production it seems like a gross waste of money to divert this amount to the eradication of ticks and "educational and demonstrational methods," the results of which in increasing food production are most uncertain when compared with the sure results that would come from the expenditure of this money on the irrigation districts I have mentioned. I have mentioned only a small number of the possible irrigation projects in my district, which contains, according to the report of the Reclamation Service, 1,000,000 acres capable of successful irrigation, with a wheat-producing capacity of from 30,000,000 to 50,000,000 bushels of wheat yearly.

This administration is making a great mistake when it does not put forth most strenuous efforts to increase the reclamation fund by an appropriation from the Treasury of the United States. The reclamation fund contains only some $100,000,000. It should be increased by several hundred million dollars made reimbursable. There are in the reclamation States some 17,000,000 acres capable of profitable reclamation. The Government should at once prepare to reclaim and irrigate these lands for homes for the returning soldiers when the war is over. The absorption of soldiers into the civil life of the country was simplified after the Civil War by the enormous area of public lands which were at that time open to entry. The same absorption of soldiers will be simplified after the present war by the reclamation of our arid lands. In the short time allotted to me I can make but the briefest reference to these matters, but if the administration is sincere, and I think it is, in its desire to increase food production, no better or more practical plan or plan promising surer results could be adopted than the reclamation of the arid lands. Herein lies our insurance against food shortage.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT].

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment offered by my colleague from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL]. The bill as it stands gives the Secretary of Agriculture the unrestricted right and authority to mobilize the labor of the farm, so long as it does not interfere with the needs of the community from which it is desired to move it, and the Secretary alone passes on these needs. My colleague represents an almost purely agricultural district, one of the best in our State. I represent a district which is mainly agricultural, but in which we have quite a number of other industries. It is not only the people on the farms that have suffered by the entry of labor agents, but even some of our very best industries have suffered. Several men came into my home town of Gadsden, Ala., lately, where we have a large steel plant, hunting laborers for a big industry in another section. We have a law in Alabama penalizing such agents, and yet a number of them came in there, and when our State authorities, under the police powers of the State, started to arrest them for these violations they simply threw back their lapels and showed a Government badge and said they had authority from the War Department to do what they were doing.

I understand that there was a ruling a short time ago in the Judge Advocate General's office, that in spite of any laws of the States to the contrary, they might go in and get men to work on so-called Government industries.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. BURNETT. I will.

Mr. STEAGALL. I want to say in that connection, in all fairness to the War Department, that when they were fully acquainted with the conditions in Alabama they withdrew the instructions.

Mr. BURNETT. I understand that. But much harm was done before they withdrew them. It was shown the other day in debate on this bill where a discretion was outrageously abused by the Secretary of Agriculture in securing the exemption of 2,000 men from the draft. In that department there are about 20,000 persons, men and women, old and young, employed, and 2,000, or one-tenth of them, had been on the recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture exempted from the draft.

That revelation showed how dangerous it is to allow that Cabinet officer, at least, such wide discretion on important matters. I am sure the President does not know of this gross perversion of authority or he would not permit it.

Gentlemen in trying to extenuate the matter said that the Secretary of Agriculture could not grant such exemptions; that only the local or district boards could do it. But we all know that the boards would not do it except on the request of the Secretary of Agriculture, and that a request from such a high official would almost be regarded as a command, especially as the several boards could not know how many such requests he had made of other boards. It may be that the other departments are just as bad, and if so, the sooner an investigation is had and the light of pitiless publicity turned on the better it will be for the country.

While the farmer boys who grow the crops to feed the armies and the people are being taken, while Government and other industries are depopulating the farms, it is outrageous to have 2,000 so-called scientists and experts exempted from the draft in that way.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

By unanimous consent, Mr. STEAGALL, Mr. CRAMTON, Mr. GREEN of Iowa, and Mr. HAUGEN were granted leave to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, last year we prohibited the use of grains in the manufacture of distilled spirits. We gave the President power to limit, regulate, or prohibit the use of food, fruits, food materials, and feeds in the production of malt or vinous liquors for beverage purposes whenever he found that such action was necessary "to insure an adequate food supply." We prohibited the use of grains in the manufacture of distilled spirits. In pursuance of the authority given the President, he has limited the amount of grain that may be used in the manufacture of malt liquors to 70 per cent of the amount previously used. The alcoholic content of beer has been reduced to 2.75 per cent. Further limitations of brewing are now said to be under consideration.

The Randall amendment proposes that an appropriation of $6,100,000 included in this bill for agricultural purposes shall not be available unless the President shall prohibit the use of food, fruits, food materials, and feeds in the production of malt or vinous liquors for beverage purposes. Last year we gave the President a discretionary power over this question. Now we appropriate a sum of money supposedly for a necessary purpose, yet deny its use for such purpose unless the President shall make a certain order whether its conforms to his judgment or not. In other words, you try to control the discretion of the President with a club. Does any man who votes for the Randall amendment honestly doubt the ability or the willingness of the President to do the right thing in this regard?

Does any such man assume a more earnest desire to defend the best interests of our country? Is there anything in the career of our President which would justify a belief that he would approve of or yield to such methods of legislation?

This effort is in line with many efforts heretofore attempted during the war to hamper the President's handling of war situations. Such efforts have not been made with unpatriotic intent. But the man whose failure to comprehend the breadth of the problems of this war, with its intensely human phases, can perform a more useful service by refraining from interfering with a President, who is meeting those problems with full comprehension and rare tact.

As a "war measure" this amendment is a pretense instead of a fact. It is proposed by a Member who voted against the war. It is a political camouflage. It is an attempt to take advantage of a war situation to advance a propaganda movement.

Some months ago I was in one of the Southern States, and for the first time in my life saw a field of growing tobacco being cultivated. It surrounded a dwelling house that was old, weather beaten, yet neat and clean; a home almost of poverty; a humble but worthy American home. The husband and father was holding the handles of a cultivator, pulled by a horse he was driving between the rows of the tobacco plants. Near by a little sister, barefooted, was leading another horse hitched to a cultivator down between other rows, while a little brother, also shoeless, too young to drive the horse and manage the cultivator at the same time, was holding its handles. The wife and mother of the household with a hoe was going through the rows of tobacco plants cutting out weeds. That farm was devoted to tobacco cultivation. It was the investment of that family; taking care of it was their work; that crop when sold meant their food and clothing.

I had before me an article in which the writer called attention to the vast acreage of land in this country devoted to the production of tobacco which could produce wheat, and in which it was claimed Congress should immediately pass a law prohibiting the production and manufacture of tobacco as a matter of food conservation. When I saw that humble home, typical of the tobacco-producing States, and realized how such families labor and sacrifice to produce their crop, I said to myself, "before I would vote for a law which would prevent such people from gaining the reward of their labor in a crop that was already planted I would resign from Congress." Yet that is exactly what is now attempted by the Randall amendment. The grapes on the vines in California and elsewhere in this country are nearing the ripening time. The labor and all the expense of producing them has been incurred. The soil could be devoted to no other purpose this year. The planting time is now past, even if the farmers should conclude to dig up vines more valuable than the land in which they are planted. The wine grapes have no sale or market value for food, feed, or any other use.

It takes four years to raise grape vines to a producing age, a profit-bearing crop. It costs the California grower from $200 to $300 per acre to raise resistant vines to that age. If this amendment is made a permanent law it would cause a loss to the farmers who grow grapes in California alone of $30,000,000. Families, similar to that family in the South, dependent on their grape crop for food and clothing and whose sons are now in the battle line in France or in the United States Army preparing to go would by this amendment be robbed of the reward of their labor. It is not an inspiring sight to see Members of Congress, drawing large salaries, proposing to enact a law at this time which would rob the families of our soldier boys, fighting for us and our country, of their means of sustenance, of their bread and butter. Such a course can not be justified on any principles of morality known to a normal mind. This amendment is not fair nor just. It lacks that common honesty that should characterize this Nation in dealing with its people.

The grape growers in California represent the average citizenship of our State. They represent an industry of importance. Over 160,000 acres of land are devoted to the growing of wine grapes; 16,000 acres in my county alone. That is the primary source of the living of thousands of small farmers who have been encouraged to go into the business by the United States and the State of California. California has spent a quarter of a million of dollars in encouraging the industry. The United States has established and to-day has 12 experimental vineyards on the Pacific coast for the same purpose. These farmers planted the vines, worked, pruned, and cultivated their vineyards for four years before they secured a profit-bearing crop in return. They raised their vineyards as a means of supporting their families and themselves and educating their children. Not one pound of grain is used in the manufacture of those wines. To pretend that you are going to save bread by preventing the manufacture of wine is a sham. The grapes upon those vines are approaching harvest time. They have no market value for any other purpose than the manufacture of wine. To step in at this late hour and pass an act which destroys the value of that crop is an inconsiderate and wanton use of power.

The wine grapes of the country, which have no appreciable food value, if manufactured into wine, could eventually be sold to the foreign trade, and our grape growers would thereby in part be saved from the calamitous injury that this amendment would inflict upon them. But even that measure of justice and liberality is denied our farmers by the terms of this amendment, which absolutely prohibits the use of such grapes and would force them to rot on the vines instead of bringing an income to their owners, who have produced them at great labor and expense.

As a man, as a citizen, as a Member of Congress I am determined that whatever part I take in this war shall be a worthy one. Some day after the hardships and the perils, after the war, our boys are going to come back bringing the flag of our country in triumph. When that day comes I want to be able to welcome them at the shore or at their homes, look them square in the eye, and have a consciousness of having done the right thing by them, however humble it may be. I do not want to go back to California and have the mother or father of one of those boys say to me: "While we were buying liberty bonds, contributing to Red Cross, and while our son was fighting 6,000 miles away in Europe and offering his life for the country you were in Congress drawing a good salary and voting to rob us of the earnings of a lifetime under a false pretense of conserving grain."

One year ago a similar effort to this was made to establish "immediate war prohibition" without any sensible or just consideration of the rights of those who would be unjustly injured thereby, without warning and without any opportunity to devote themselves to other industries before the prohibition was put into effect. Shortly after that I returned to my home in California. One of the first men I met was a fine type of Christian gentleman, who, all his life, had been a teacher of Sunday school and of temperance. Speaking in reference to the effort similar to this he said: "Do those men in Congress think because we believe in temperance we are in favor of committing such an outrageous injustice? Do they not have faith enough in Christian people to give them credit for being honest, fair, and reasonable?"

England placed prohibitions on ardent spirits and other restrictions on the liquor business during the war. She compensated those who were directly damaged thereby.

France prohibited ardent spirits. She is a small country; the greatest wine-producing country in the world.

According to the "Commerce Reports" last year she produced 953,758,178 gallons of wine. Algeria produced 164,659,274 gallons, making a grand total of 1,118,417,452 gallons of wine produced in French territory during the greatest year of the war. The whole United States produces only about 60,000,000 gallons per year. France produced over fifteen times the amount we produced. The need of France for men and ground for growing foodstuff has been most acute and pressing. Yet she has never found it necessary to commit any such injustice against her citizens as is here proposed.

With much earnestness it is contended that prohibition of the manufacture of barley into beer is necessary for the conservation of food. Who is better able to decide the question of the necessity and advisability of so doing than the President, who has the advice and information and action of the Food Administration, the Agricultural Department, and all the various departments of the Government, and also a better knowledge of the domestic conditions of our allies than is available to any Member of Congress? For my part, I do not question his disposition or willingness or ability to handle that question to the best advantage of our Nation. All other provisions for the conservation and production of foods and feeds have been left to the President. Why prescribe a different rule in this one case, which, most of all, has a human phase and requires the exercise of discretion and changes in regulations from time to time to suit whatever conditions may arise?

The amount of grain consumed in the manufacture of malt liquors this year will be about 1 per cent of the grain production of the country, principally barley. Wheat, corn, rye, oats, and barley—probably in the order named—are useful for bread-making purposes. Barley is now and will continue to be used primarily as a feed for stock. On the 28th day of last May Prof. A. E. Taylor, assistant to the Secretary of Agriculture, wrote the chairman of the Agricultural Committee concerning this question as follows:

> Brewers' grains constitute a favorite feeding concentrate for dairy cattle. For practical purposes the conversion of barley into beer is tantamount to feeding barley to live stock, since in the brewers' grains remains the largest fraction of the protein of the barley.

The present regulations require products of barley after brewing to be used for feed purposes. The quantity of feed material is lessened by the brewing, but there is a partial gain in food value in the fact that the grain has been made more digestible by cooking instead of being fed raw. It is probably a modest estimate to say that the residuary product of the barley after brewing is equal to one-third of its original feed value before brewing. Something less than 40,000,000 bushels of barley will be used in brewing this year. The amount of barley actually withdrawn from food and feed uses will not exceed 30,000,000 bushels, and probably less. That is a large amount to constitute a proportionately small part of the total grain production of the country. Unquestionably it is an amount of importance.

The most available source for the conservation of grain is by limiting the production of tobacco. Over 1,411,000 acres of good agricultural land in this country is devoted to the production of tobacco. That land, figured only at the average yield of the country, would produce over 21,000,000 bushels of wheat per year, over 34,000,000 bushels of corn, over 35,000,000 bushels of barley, and over 42,000,000 bushels of oats. We produce over 1,220,000,000 pounds of tobacco and ordinarily import over 45,000,000 pounds. The tobacco bill of the Nation is greater than its bread bill. The tobacco dealers of this country who annually sell over $200 worth of tobacco are required to pay a special tax. There are 447,766 such dealers. Tobacco is an annual crop that requires much labor, has no food value, and may be classed as a "useless" crop. It is an annual crop that does not require a permanent investment independent of the soil which may well be used for other crops of a food-producing character. Prohibiting the production of tobacco prior to planting time when no growing crop is involved would not inflict a serious loss upon the producer.

I deem it advisable to give the President the same power in reference to tobacco production that he has in reference to the manufacture of light liquors. I would think it unwise to interfere unnecessarily with the habits of those who, perhaps unwisely, use tobacco. But whenever the point of not mere inconvenience, but real necessity, is reached, tobacco production, like beer production, should give way for food and feed.

Fortunately our people are affectionately disposed toward our Government, appreciate its cause, and are entirely willing to make sacrifices and endure inconveniences for victory. When it becomes really necessary, it would be a very unpatriotic and disloyal man that would complain of the prohibition of his beer when such becomes necessary in order to supply our people or our allies with bread. The Nation can do without beer rather than bread. Whenever that point arrives, beer must go, of course. When that time arrives, the President has the power which we have given him and which he will use for that purpose. When the President exercises that power, our people will believe he does so because of the necessity that requires it and not as a mere response to a propaganda.

In my judgment, it is inadvisable for those who desire to pursue the most patriotic course in war time and who do not like alcoholic liquors to seize upon the war as a pretext for enforcing their views upon others who do not agree with them, where only a comparatively nonintoxicating beverage is concerned. Leave the President alone. He is doing his work well. If those so interested would seek to stop the beverage use of ardent spirits during the war or permanently, and provide a method by which strong alcoholic liquors could be sold to the Government and used for mechanical and ammunition purposes, their effort might be sustained with more reason. But nothing of that kind is attempted in this amendment.

Turkey has long been the one important absolutely prohibition nation. Russia established it for the war. The other warring nations prohibited or greatly restricted the use of ardent spirits, and under regulations to conserve grain and protect their soldiers, permit the use of light liquors. The law giving the President power to regulate the production of light liquors is in line with the action of the other enlightened nations at war and approved by their experience. We have reason for greater confidence in the war leadership of France and England than in that of Turkey and Russia.

The question has been raised here as to why the President has not stopped the manufacture of beer. The President has been a student of this war and its conditions in this and other countries. He is aware of the consideration that was given this question in England. England was divided into eight different sections, for each of which a commission of three was appointed to investigate industrial unrest. A comprehensive investigation was made after England had imposed radical restriction upon the output of beer and limited its alcoholic content as we have done. Among other things these commissions reported:

> The feeling in the minds of the workers that their conditions of work and destinies are being determined by a distant authority over which they have no influence requires to be taken into consideration, not only by the Government but by the unions themselves.
> Rightly or wrongly the workers are convinced that beer is an indispensable beverage for men engaged in the so-called "hot" or "heavy" trades. If it were demonstrated that a reduction of brewing was necessary in the interests of food conservation, there is no reason to doubt that all classes would loyally acquiesce in whatever diminution was deemed essential, but the belief is prevalent that certain parties are endeavoring to use the national exigencies as an excuse for forcing on prohibition, and to this the great body of workers are bitterly opposed.
> It is the view of the commissioners that unless the national demands for food require it no further curtailment of the supply of beer in munition areas should take place.
> As an employer sensibly observed to us: "I should not call the liquor restrictions a cause of unrest, but I should unhesitatingly say they are a source of considerable loss of social temper." This, we think, was wisely said, and the matter should be sensibly dealt with, not from the high ideals of temperance reformers, whose schemes of betterment must be kept in their proper place until after the war, but from the human point of view of keeping the man who has to do war work in a good temper, which will enable him to make necessary sacrifices in a contented spirit.
> They think, perhaps wrongly, that it is necessary for their work, and when you want them to give the Nation their best work it is an utterly stupid thing to deny to them a small luxury which throughout their lives they have been used to receive. There would be much more sense in depriving England of tobacco, but it would not help to win the war.
> The way the matter has been put before us by sensible men and women who are not faddists—and it is only fair to say that the teetotalers who have spoken to us on the subject recognize, like sensible men, that this is not the time to seek to enforce their political mission—is that a reasonable amount of beer for workers who are used to it and want it should be given to them.
> The problem is a human problem and must be dealt with at the moment, not from any ideal standpoint but by recognizing that you can not get the best work out of a human being by unnecessary interference with the course of life to which he has been accustomed.
> It must be remembered that we are dealing with men who all their lives have been accustomed to drink beer when they want it. We hold no brief either for or against beer drinking, but we are convinced that there is a question which men must settle for themselves, and that it must be recognized that beer is more than a drink. Without going into the thorny question of whether it is a food, it certainly is a social habit or a custom of life, as two witnesses expressed it.

Barley when converted into beer now pays the Government a tax twice the amount of its sale price.

Under the limitations imposed by the President, beer is now practically a nonintoxicating drink. California recently had a law under which a liquor containing not over 2 per cent of alcohol was considered a nonalcoholic drink. Beer now contains only three-quarters of 1 per cent more.

There are thousands and thousands of people in this country of foreign extraction who have been accustomed to the use of light liquors all their lives, and who, wisely or unwisely, regard them as desirable and necessary according to their custom of life. We have thousands of Italian-Americans, a very large percentage of whom would rather give up the use of potatoes than the use of light wines. So it is with a vast number of French-Americans. We have a numerous population of German-Americans who have likewise been accustomed to the use of beer. Altogether there are millions of our population who would regard prohibition of these very light liquors as an officious and unwarranted interference with their custom of life.

I take it that the only right that Congress has to legislate upon this amendment is as a war necessity. Congress is asserting a power it has no right to exercise in time of peace. That fact should deter us from inconsiderate action.

But I believe that the moral right of any legislative body, outside of war conditions, to pass laws concerning individual habits is limited to those cases in which the indulgence of the practice or habit is injurious to others. Society is justified in legislating against the ardent spirits, because overindulgence therein is so common as to constitute a weakness of and an offense against one's home, family, and society in a material degree. But I do not believe that the man who uses beer containing not more than 2.75 per cent of alcohol so far offends against society that his act should be made a Federal crime. I believe it is an unwise course for this Nation to pursue to say to one of the great States of this Union, against the will of the citizens of such State, "Any one of your citizens who has in his possession a bottle of 2.75 per cent beer commits a crime against this Nation for which he may be dragged hundreds of miles from his home and tried in the Federal court." I proposed an amendment to the Federal prohibition amendment under which, if it had been adopted, all ardent spirits would have been prohibited and each State in the country would have reserved the opportunity for itself of deciding whether or not it should regulate, restrict, or prohibit the use of light liquors. The enactment of such a law would have been more consistent with the genius of the American people and a better contribution to a wise disposal of the question than can be secured by such a law as is now proposed. When analyzed to its elements, this effort is an attempt on the part of States and communities, which have exercised their own discretion in disposing of the liquor question, to deny that privilege to the nonconsenting States of the Union.

In our wide expanse of territory and varied conditions local State government is of vast importance in our plan of legislation. It is the primary means of self-assertion and self-determination by the States and their people. It should not be lightly abandoned.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of the time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I want to thank you for your applause, and I am sure that you are warranted in giving it to me, for the very good reason that I am the only man on our committee, and so far the only man in the House, who has appeared here in support of the original proposition presented by the committee and opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG] to strike it out. It might seem as though possibly I ought to help you to make it unanimous, but I do not feel like doing that, and so I am going to take a little time to discuss the proposition.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUBEY. No. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman, but, as I have to do all the talking for the proposition, I will have to take all the time.

I am glad, and so are you, that the reports that come to us from every part of this country of ours predict an enormous crop. The reports that come from my State show that we are going to have the largest crop that we ever had. [Applause.] And reports of that kind come from every State in the Union.

There is only one thing that is going to hurt us in the food production this year, and that is the question of taking care of the crops when they have been grown and it becomes necessary to harvest them. Every man, I think, who has spoken on the floor of this House in behalf of agriculture within the last two or three months has called attention to the fact that the one great danger confronting agriculture is the labor question, the manner in which we shall get labor to care for the work on the farm.

That is the one question that presents danger, and we all agree that a favorable solution of that question is desirable. We ought to accomplish it in some way. There has been only one proposition brought into this House providing for taking care of the labor situation, and that is the provision in this bill. We passed it through this House about a month and a half ago, and we then appropriated $2,500,000 for this purpose. That bill went through the House and $2,500,000 was appropriated for the purpose of giving the Secretary of Agriculture, in cooperation with the Secretary of Labor, the right to mobilize labor. That bill went to the Senate. It is over there now. It has never been acted upon. And so we felt that we ought to put the provision into this bill. But instead of asking for $2,500,000 we have reduced the amount to $500,000 and framed it in the shape of a revolving fund.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is an amendment offered here by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] in regard to the question of contract labor. There is no objection to that amendment, and I am sure it ought to be agreed to. We do not desire that the Secretary of Agriculture should—and he would not—take labor that was already contracted for something else.

A great deal has been said about duplication of work. A year ago after we passed the appropriation giving the President of the United States $100,000,000 as an emergency fund, what did he do? He turned over $800,000 of that fund to the Secretary of Labor and to the Secretary of Agriculture for carrying on the very work that we are asking for in this bill. They have been cooperating together and doing that work now for a year, and there has been no complaint about it. They have been using the money that was given to them by the President, working together in mobilizing farm labor. Now, when we come to the House of Representatives and ask the House of Representatives to give $500,000 for this purpose, a sum $300,000 less than the President himself gave to this kind of work a year ago, then we see every man who talks about it getting on the floor and saying it is duplication of work.

I want to read to you a letter which I have from the Secretary of Agriculture upon this question of duplication of work. The letter is a copy of a letter addressed by the Secretary of Agriculture to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations upon this very subject, and I want gentlemen who have talked about duplication of work to listen to the reading of this letter. It is dated May 8. I read:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, May 8, 1918.

Hon. SWAGAR SHERLEY,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SHERLEY: Secretary Wilson called me on the telephone a little while ago and indicated that you would like to have some expression from me regarding the item for mobilizing and distributing farm labor in the pending food-production act. I understand that Secretary Wilson has asked for an additional sum for mobilizing labor, and the question in your mind naturally is whether one department is likely to duplicate the activities of the other, or whether the aggregate of the two items is needed.

For a year the Departments of Agriculture and Labor have been working in close cooperation on the labor problem. This department, because it had agencies in all the rural districts, undertook to deal with the mobilization of labor in rural districts for agricultural purposes only. The Department of Labor is undertaking to mobilize labor for all industrial purposes, including city and town labor for distribution to agricultural districts so far as it may be feasible and necessary. I do not know what amount the Department of Labor has asked for, and would not be competent, of course, to pass upon their estimates. I am of the opinion, however, that the appropriation of the sum indicated in the food-production act for this department is desirable. The present indications are that the chief limiting factor in agriculture this year may be labor, especially for harvesting. There was planted last year the largest wheat acreage on record, and the indications are that the acreage to be harvested this year will be about 36,400,000, the second largest crop on record, against 27,400,000 last year. The rye acreage, it is estimated, will be 5,435,000, the largest on record, against 4,102,000 last year. I have reason to believe that there will be a larger acreage of spring wheat than usual, and that the plantings of other staple crops will be heavy. It would be highly unfortunate, in case the country should be blessed with abundant crops in this crisis, to fail to reap them in season and to safeguard them. The item in question would enable this department to render much assistance. It is in the nature, at least, of insurance. It would not be expended unless the circumstances demanded it. I think it would be unsafe not to have it.

I understand that Secretary Wilson has advised you that I consulted with him before the item was inserted and that he approves it. He and I will see to it that the cooperative relations between the two departments are effective and that there will be no waste of effort or funds.

Very truly, yours,

———— ————,
Secretary.

Now, gentlemen, that shows the position of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield for a question right there?

Mr. RUBEY. I will. Make it short.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes. The gentleman will admit, of course, that this letter was not written in regard to this item in the bill?

Mr. RUBEY. It was about this very item.

Mr. HAMLIN. About this item?

Mr. RUBEY. This item in this bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. This was written to the chairman of the Committe on Appropriations.

Mr. RUBEY. I know; but it was written to him to explain this item, because the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations was thinking about opposing it, and he asked for the facts in the case, and the letter was written to the chairman of the committee in order to express his views on this very item.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will ask the gentleman another question. Did the Secretary of Agriculture estimate for this item?

Mr. RUBEY. In a supplemental estimate only, not in the regular appropriation bill. When his attention was called to the fact that the bill we passed for $2,500,000 might possibly fail in the Senate, he said by all means it ought to be put upon this bill as an amendment, because if the other did not go through this would serve as a revolving fund to take its place.

Mr. HAMLIN. It is not the original estimate?

Mr. RUBEY. It is a supplemental estimate.

Mr. HAUGEN. As to the original estimate is it not a fact that no money was being expended along this line of work by any department?

Mr. RUBEY. That could not be true, because the sum of $800,000 was being used by the Secretary of Labor and the Secretary of Agriculture, and they have been using it for a year, and the object of this legislation is to give the money in order that this work may be continued the coming year just as it has been done during the present year. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG] to strike out the paragraph will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The vote will first be taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] to perfect the text. The Chair will direct the Clerk to report that amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEAGALL: Page 5, line 19, after the word "agriculture," strike out all down to the word "engaged" in line 20 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and all labor under contract for the performance of service as agriculturists or farm laborers," so that the sentence as amended will read:

"Agricultural labor actually employed in agriculture and all labor under contract for the performance of service as agriculturists or farm laborers and needed for cultivation and harvesting crops where engaged shall not be mobilized nor transported under the provisions of this item, and the Secretary of Agriculture shall, as soon as practicable after the close of the calendar year 1918, cause to be made to the Congress a detailed statement showing as far as possible the number of persons transported and employed and a detailed statement of all disbursements under this item.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, there is no objection to that amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG] to strike out the entire section.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. RUBEY), there were—ayes 99, noes 17.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we could not have tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri demands tellers.

Tellers were refused, five members, not a sufficient number, seconding the demand.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are refused. On this vote the ayes are 99 and the noes 17. The ayes have it, and the motion to strike out prevails.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman desire to extend his remarks on this bill?

Mr. HEFLIN. Upon the legislative work of Congress since the war commenced.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I prefer that that request be made in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects.

Mr. HEFLIN. What reason did the gentleman from Pennsylvania give, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. CRAMTON. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The request is not in order now, anyway. The committee had decided to rise, and the Chair was simply waiting the coming of the Speaker.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman came in at the wrong time. If he wants a reason he ought to have come in in the regular way. The gentleman came in in an irregular way.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will be here at the regular time, then.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the proper thing to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will rise and report the bill to the House.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products," had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded upon any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a separate vote on the Randall amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts demands a separate vote on the Randall amendment.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, pending that request for a separate vote, as I have been unavoidably absent from the city for a day or two, I would like unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes in explaining my views on that subject.

Mr. RAKER. I ask for a separate vote on the Young amendment.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request.

Mr. RUCKER. Then I withdraw my request to address the House.

Mr. RAKER. I withdraw my request, too.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I renew the request made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] for a separate vote on the Randall amendment.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I renew the request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] renew the request for a separate vote upon the Randall amendment. Is a separate vote demanded upon any other amendment?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, if a separate vote is demanded on that I ask for a separate vote on the Young amendment to strike out the last section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] demands a separate vote on the Young amendment. Is there a request for a separate vote on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put the others in gross.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A parliamentary inquiry. I should like to know whether a separate vote has been demanded on the Randall amendment? My attention was diverted for the moment, and I did not hear the request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has been demanded.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request for a separate vote.

Mr. COX. I renew it, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] withdraws his request. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] demanded a separate vote.

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] renewed the request.

Mr. COX. I have renewed the request.

Mr. LONGWORTH. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A separate vote on the Randall amendment was demanded by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] and by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN]. The gentleman from New York has withdrawn his request, but the gentleman from Texas has not withdrawn his demand.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, what was the request made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox]?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He renewed the demand.

Mr. SLAYDEN. For a separate vote on the Randall amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On the Randall amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The previous question not having been ordered, is debate on the Randall amendment in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question not having been ordered or demanded, debate is in order.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. The previous question is ordered under the rule on the bill and all amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the previous question is ordered in the rule.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then there is no opportunity for debate?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No opportunity for debate.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Have the demands for a separate vote on the Randall amendment been withdrawn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No; the demand for a separate vote on the Randall amendment still stands. Is there a demand for a separate vote on any other amendment except the Randall and the Young amendments? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Chair will put the other amendments in gross.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the previous question is ordered.

Mr. RUCKER. It is ordered by the rule, but I could have the time by unanimous consent. Does the adoption of the previous question preclude the House from transacting business by unanimous consent? I would like to express my views on this amendment.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request for a separate vote on the Randall amendment.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If it is likely to provoke debate, I withdraw my request for a separate vote on the Randall amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as all the Democrats who have made the demand have withdrawn it, evidently wishing to avoid the issue, I renew the demand.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. RUBEY. If we are going to have a separate vote on these amendments I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point of order that no quorum is present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RUCKER) there were 67 ayes and 27 noes.

So a call of the House was ordered.

The Doorkeeper was directed to close the doors and the Sergeant at Arms to notify the absentees.

Mr. SLAYDEN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is this a vote to concur in the amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No; it is merely a call of the House.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Alexander	Dill	Heintz	McKinley
Anthony	Dillon	Hicks	McLaughlin, Pa.
Ashbrook	Drukker	Hilliard	Mann
Austin	Dunn	Hood	Mason
Bankhead	Edmonds	Howard	Meeker

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this call 311 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded upon any other amendments than the Randall amendment and the Young amendment? If not, the Speaker will put the other amendments in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments other than the Randall amendment and the Young amendment.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the Randall amendment.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RUCKER. I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUCKER. I want to know if it is proper to ask unanimous consent now to explain why a man who favors prohibition in principle will not vote for this amendment? I would like to have a chance to do it, and I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Missouri that the previous question having been ordered, it is not in order to debate.

Mr. RUCKER. If the Chair will indulge me a moment, I am in favor of prohibition, but not in this way. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL].

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that the Randall amendment may be again reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk again reported the Randall amendment.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, if this amendment should be agreed to, then the Congress of the United States——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri is propounding a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, if this amendment should be adopted, then the farmers of the United States would be denied the benefit of this appropriation unless we could whip the President into submission.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. The question is on agreeing to the Randall amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RANDALL) there were—ayes 112, noes 96.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 178, nays 135, answered "present" 3, not voting 114, as follows:

Mr. ALEXANDER (for) with Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts (against).

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening when his name was called?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I came in the Hall just about as my name was called.

The SPEAKER. Did the Clerk call the gentleman's name before he got in or afterwards?

Mr. ANTHONY. It was a very close shave, Mr. Speaker. I would like to have my name called. I desire to vote "present."

The name of Mr. ANTHONY was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening?

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, if I could vote, I would vote "aye." May I vote "present"?

The name of Mr. EMERSON was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Young amendment, striking out the last section.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. RAKER. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman insist on a division?

Mr. RAKER. I insist on a division.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 161, noes 26.

So the Young amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; was read the third time.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New Jersey rise?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. To offer a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. I am.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HUTCHINSON moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Agriculture with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following amendments:

On page 2, line 6, after the word "product," strike out the amount "$1,058,975" and insert in lieu thereof "for the following stated purposes and in amounts as follows: Eradication of cattle ticks, $61,610; eradication of hog cholera, $202,965; eradication of abortion, influenza, strangles, etc., $175,000; production of beef cattle, $105,000; live-stock production in the great plains regions, $100,000; production of pork, $150,000; production of poultry, $129,600; production of sheep, $60,000;

So the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma with Mr. FORDNEY.

Mr. CHURCH with Mr. CHANDLER of New York.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia with Mr. FOCHT.

Mr. DOREMUS with Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts.

Mr. FIELDS with Mr. GILLETT.

Mr. GORDON with Mr. GREENE of Vermont.

Mr. MARTIN with Mr. HULL of Iowa.

Mr. RUCKER with Mr. GRIEST.

Mr. VENABLE with Mr. CLASSON.

Mr. SLAYDEN with Mr. SANFORD.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "aye."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening?

Mr. EVANS. I was not.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman can not vote.

Mr. EVANS. Then I desire to be recorded as "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. EVANS, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LONERGAN for four days, on account of important business.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the bill just passed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Agricultural bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

CHARLES A. CAREY (H. REPT. NO. 553, PT. 2).

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a request for unanimous consent. On May 10 the Committee on Claims reported favorably to the House the bill (H. R. 3820) for the relief of Charles A. Carey. On May 15 a member of the committee—Mr. BLANTON, of Texas—filed minority views on the ground that the evidence before the committee had not been, in his judgment, sufficient to warrant a favorable report. Since that occurred I have secured from the files of a previous Congress the affidavits and evidence submitted in the Sixty-fourth Congress in support of the bill and have exhibited them to Mr. BLANTON, who is now satisfied to withdraw the minority views. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that that may be done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that Mr. BLANTON be permitted to withdraw his minority report on the bill named. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PENSIONS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the appointment of conferees. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 8496) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 8496, a pension bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. SHERWOOD, Mr. RUSSELL, and Mr. LANGLEY.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, there were seven other bills of the same character in the same situation. I ask for the same order in the case of the bill (H. R. 9160) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; the bill (H. R. 9612) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; the bill (H. R. 10027) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; the bill (H. R. 10477) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; the bill (H. R. 10850) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; the bill (H. R. 11364) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and the bill (H. R. 11663) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

The SPEAKER. These are all House bills with Senate amendments?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes; they are all omnibus House pension bills with Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to take all these bills from the Speaker's table, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House on all the foregoing bills Mr. SHERWOOD, Mr. RUSSELL, and Mr. LANGLEY.

EXPLORATION FOR COAL, PHOSPHATE, OIL, AND GAS.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate bill 2812, to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain, and, pending that, I want to see if I can agree with the ranking Member on the other side as to the time for general debate. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, after conversation with the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], that we have an hour and a half of general debate, 45 minutes on either side, and that the debate be confined to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate bill 2812, and, pending that, he asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to an hour and a half. Is there objection?

Mr. NORTON. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, which I do not intend to do, I would like to ask the gentleman if, in case this consent is given, he expects to complete the general debate to-night and then take up the bill under the five-minute rule to-morrow?

Mr. FERRIS. That is the intention.

Mr. MADDEN. If that is the plan, I will serve notice on the gentleman now that I shall object.

Mr. FERRIS. Why?

Mr. MADDEN. It is too important a bill to dispose of in such a short time. Opportunity should be given to study it. Members can not give careful study to everything. There ought to be opportunity given for full consideration. There are a lot of people who can not study everything, and this is one of the things I have not had a chance to study.

Mr. FERRIS. Let me suggest to the gentleman—I think it will appeal to him—that this bill has twice passed the House after almost endless discussion and consideration. If we announce now a long general debate, three or four hours, the Chair will at once be vacated. After a conference with Members on that side and also on my own side, I thought we would have a short general debate and then be liberal under the five-minute rule, where we get real consideration and can give some information to the House.

Mr. MADDEN. That puts it entirely into the hands of the gentleman from Oklahoma. When we get into the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule, if some gentleman wants to get 5 or 10 minutes on a question of real importance, the gentleman may say, "I object."

Mr. FERRIS. I am just stating to the gentleman that we do not propose to do anything of that kind.

Mr. MADDEN. If I have the assurance of the gentleman that he will open his mind and be liberal, for once [laughter]——

Mr. FERRIS. Certainly. The gentleman ought not to say that. I have always been so liberal that sometimes the House has felt like throwing us out for using so much time.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman from Illinois can still resort to his prerogative of calling attention to the absence of a quorum, can he not? [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. I really do not know much about the rules of the House. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, still reserving the right to object, can we have the assurance of the gentleman from Oklahoma and the leader of the majority that no other business will be considered this afternoon except general debate on this bill?

Mr. FERRIS. After having a conversation with the majority leader, that was the suggestion he made, and I gladly carry that out.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Still further reserving the right to object, after the committee determines to rise, and other gentlemen who are not particularly interested in the general debate have gone away to attend to some other important business——

A MEMBER. Or go to the ball game. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. No; no ball game—is there any danger of some one taking snap judgment in their absence and asking for the transaction of some important business in the absence of Members?

Mr. FERRIS. No; if the gentleman insists upon it I will then move to adjourn.

Mr. MADDEN. That will be all right.

Mr. NORTON. I have been hoping to get 20 minutes under general debate to speak on subjects not strictly pertaining to the bill. Does the gentleman say that to-morrow there will be an opportunity to get about 10 minutes?

Mr. FERRIS. I hope the gentleman will not make us vary from the rule. If we begin to talk generally on other subjects than the bill, I think the gentleman himself realizes that we may run very far afield, and Members on both sides have desired to talk a short time about the bill and then get it out of the way. I hope the gentleman will not insist.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are several appropriation bills awaiting consideration.

Mr. FERRIS. There are a lot of them coming along. The military bill, carrying $9,000,000,000, will be up for consideration Monday, and a deficiency bill, on which debate will be more in order than it is on one of these bills.

Mr. CRAMTON. This is really an emergency measure, and a number of Members have foregone speeches in order to hasten its consideration.

Mr. NORTON. I sincerely trust that the gentleman is not one of those who have foregone making a speech, because it is always so delightful and pleasant to hear from the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 2812) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain, with Mr. DEWALT in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to myself not exceeding 10 minutes.

This bill, or one very much like it, has twice passed the House of Representatives after very long and extended consideration. It received on both occasions the very closest scrutiny. Amendments of all sorts were offered and voted upon, and it was given the very closest sort of attention. It went to the Senate. It was there loaded up with amendments, but on former occasions did not pass the Senate. This time the Senate passed this bill

(S. 2812) first, and it came over here last December. The House committee at once began to consider it, to try to perfect the bill. It has been a very painful task to try to get a bill that would meet the fancies and the ideas of all the people who were interested in it. The Secretary of the Interior, who is the general administrator of the public lands—so he, of course, was keenly interested in it—has been using diligence to at all times maintain the public interest. The Navy Department having three naval reserves out there withdrawn by Executive order, they, too, were interested in it; they have been diligently trying to conserve the oil for the Navy. The Department of Justice have 55 suits out there; they, too, were interested in it; they were striving to protect the Government's interest. The Committee on the Public Lands invited these three departments to bring their representatives down to our committee, sit there with us, make suggestions to us, work with us, and help us to perfect a bill that would protect the Government interests and do justice all around. The Committee on the Public Lands, too, have been tireless in their efforts; no selfishness or sordid considerations have ever crept in. Two or three times during the progress of this bill in the committee it was thought that we would not be able to report any bill. I was not sure that we would get a bill that would harmonize all these various departments. The committee had a great deal of trouble in arriving at a just conclusion. At last we came to the agreement to strike out every line of the Senate bill and put up a new bill. The bill as it stands has the support of the Public Lands Committee, as well as the support of the three departments—the Department of Justice, the Navy Department, and the Interior Department. I do not want to be vain either for myself or my committee, but it is entitled to be said that the committee has been faithful, and I believe in all things faithful to the public interest and all concerned.

It is true the oil claimants desire much more. They claim scant justice only has been done, but I think they will agree no advocates of any legislation ever had a more patient or faithful hearing.

There are vast interests in the West interested in this matter. Many oil men have gone out on the public domain and developed oil. A good many of them claim that the bill does scant justice to them, and I think that is the opinion of most of them. Many good men in and out of Congress think the bill does scant justice to them, and good men on the committee think that the bill does scant justice to them. But these are war times, and we are trying to conserve oil for the Navy, oil for the public, and no one can now be tolerated to be harsh with his Government. The Department of Justice is fighting for every right which the Government has, and if we have given the oil men scant justice it is the best the committee can do and the best the department can do and the best and only thing that we can get together on, and here it is in the bill we are presenting to you as a substitute for Senate bill 2812.

The Nation is still rich in natural resources. We have in the United States and in Alaska, roughly speaking, about 700,000,000 acres of public land, some of it hills and rocks and worthless, and some of it pretty good land, dry land, and land that can be used at least for wholesome purposes. We have 367,000,000 acres of forest reserve, administered by the Forestry Department. We have, roughly, 50,000,000 acres of coal lands, thirty or forty million acres of which are valuable for coal, and some not known as valuable. We have 6,400,000 acres of oil land, some of it producing oil and some none, and some of it probably worthless. No one can say what is in the rest of the 700,000,000 acres of Government land. It may have oil, but the rotary drill and the industrious oil man are the only ones to determine that.

The first eight sections of the bill deal with the leasing of coal. Sections 9 to 14, inclusive, deal with oil, and sections 15 to 17 deal with phosphates. We have a provision here for the leasing of Alaskan oil lands. They have found a little oil up in Alaska, and for 20 years they have been nibbling away trying to first get some oil, then some legislation. Some have produced five barrels a day and some a little more and some not a barrel. We have put in a provision making it a little more liberal than we do for the States, on account of the distance from market, the long winters, and the climatic conditions. The Alaskan people have been consulted about it, and the departments have drafted it and agreed to it. The committee have combed it over and have agreed to it. It is here for your consideration. We think it will bring development and good results. We think Alaska entitled to it.

We have a provision here for shale. They have found in Utah, Colorado, and Wyoming a material called oil shale, a rock proposition, which they can grind and from which refine oil—about 40 gallons to the ton. It is a sandstone rock, and there seems to be an inexhaustible supply of it. We have put a provision in the bill for developing that, from which we expect good results. It is here for your consideration. The departments favor it. We of the committee favor it.

There is a great oil shortage in the West, especially on the Pacific coast, and they would like to have this bill passed. The Interior Department feels the necessity of its early passage. Secretary Lane has appealed to me to hurry it up. The President of the United States has urged it for five years, Secretary Lane has urged it for five years, and the President referred to it in his message urging Congress to pass the bill, and your committee feel that they are entitled to a little credit for working and struggling for two or three months to get the bill satisfactory to all three departments and satisfactory to the committee. I do not think it is in all things satisfactory to the committee; some of the members of the committee think we do not do enough for the oil men and some feel very strongly about it, but they have swallowed their pride and got behind it and agreed to let the bill be reported and passed. They are entitled to much credit for that. Some of them fought to the last. It is the best we can do. It is all we can do. Here it is.

I do not think I have anything further to offer unless some gentleman wishes to ask a question.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. In a case where a homesteader owns the surface right, is there any preference right given him to lease the coal and oil that lies beneath the surface?

Mr. FERRIS. That provision, as I recall, was not agreed to. It was offered and urged.

Mr. MONDELL. There is a provision in the bill—perhaps the gentleman has forgotten about it—giving these men certain relief. It is a section near the end of the bill. It gives him relief under certain limited conditions.

Mr. NORTON. I think such a preference ought to be given.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman says that three departments were interested in the bill. Was not the last bill passed by the other body approved by those departments?

Mr. FERRIS. I think not; but I do not want to get into a controversy about that.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman state the principal difference between the bill passed by the Senate and the House bill now?

Mr. FERRIS. Our bill, to make a broad statement, is very much more restrictive than the Senate bill. It does not grant so wide and sweeping provisions to the oil men as the Senate bill. Our bill limits the acreage, the number of permits, higher royalties for the Government, greater regulation, and more safeguards than the Senate bill. There is quite a marked difference between the bills all the way through.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We passed a mining bill in the House some time ago, in which an appropriation was asked for $50,000,000, but it was cut to $10,000,000. Is there any conflict between that bill and this bill?

Mr. FERRIS. No; I think not. This bill does not carry any appropriation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is there any duplication between this bill and that bill?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not think so. That bill came from the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wondered, then, why that bill did not come from this committee.

Mr. FERRIS. I understood that that bill was drafted by the Bureau of Mines, and for some reason or other it was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Both bills originated with the Department of the Interior, but the gentleman from Oklahoma has gone over the bill very carefully, and he does not think that it creates any new agency in the mining bill made unnecessary by the passage of this bill.

Mr. FERRIS. I am not able to give the gentleman the best information about that. I am not very familiar with that bill, but I understand it is regulatory of mining operations and does not deal with these matters of disposition—leasing, development, and so forth. I repeat, I do not claim to have great familiarity with that bill. This, in a word, merely supplants the old antiquated placer law, that is out of date, and the old coal law, passed in 1873, which everyone recognizes needed some attention, and furnishes to the miners, the Government, and to the people a new leasing system, where the Government gets a royalty on everything that is produced, where monopoly can be controlled, where the miner's rights will be made certain, and to get rid of litigation, strife, and so forth.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It brings everything in the matter of legislation up to date?

Mr. FERRIS. It does, and makes a uniform system of all these oil leases.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The bill deals with the encouragement, promotion, and mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, sodium on the public domain?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I presume it would cover a great deal of the jurisdiction that we conferred in the mining bill over similar products.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman may be right about that, although that bill, as I understand it, has nothing to do with the disposition of minerals. It had to do with the regulation of mines and mining, but had nothing to do with the final disposal of mineral wealth.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In the consideration of the bill S. 2812, the bill under consideration, was consideration given to the mining bill?

Mr. FERRIS. Not at all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. By contrast or comparison?

Mr. FERRIS. Not at all. This bill originated, as the gentleman knows, five years ago, and this bill passed then with the approval of the House, and in the next Congress—the Sixty-fourth Congress—it passed again and then went to the Senate, where a lot of amendments were put on that killed the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We have two committees—the Committee on the Public Lands, which is an old committee, which has had jurisdiction of this particular matter for some five years, as the gentleman indicated, and we have a comparatively new committee, the Committee on Mines and Mining, which has entered the field which, to a certain extent, appears to have been covered by the Committee on the Public Lands. I want to call attention to that fact in passing.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Some time ago I received a brief from some one who seems to think this is a very bad bill.

Mr. FERRIS. I received one myself.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know anything about the merits of the statement that the brief makes; in fact, I may say that I have not read it with any degree of care, but I would like to get the opinion of the gentleman as to what the facts are with respect to the statements in the brief.

Mr. FERRIS. I read that brief. One oil company circularized the House on the bill, and if the gentleman will read those briefs carefully he will see that most of what they have to say was about the Senate bill.

Mr. MADDEN. They talk about Mr. FERRIS and the Ferris bill.

Mr. FERRIS. I understand. One of the criticisms they made was that we did not give the oil operator a large enough area in our bill.

Mr. MADDEN. That is to say, you compelled him to invest his money in an enterprise that would soon be worked out.

Mr. FERRIS. That was the main criticism, and they said in their brief that the fact that we held down the acreage so small was iniquitous in the fact that they said we did not allow a chance for another company to build and become a competitor of the Standard Oil Co. Of course, I am speaking from memory—I do not have the brief before me—that was it as I remember it.

Mr. MADDEN. Their idea was that if you gave one concern all there is they could compete with the Standard Oil Co.

Mr. FERRIS. That was the trend of their arguments as I now recall it.

Mr. MADDEN. I really did not know just what they claimed.

Mr. FERRIS. That was the objection to our bill. Then they made a lot of serious objections to the Senate bill and we have stricken out the Senate bill.

Mr. MADDEN. The royalties charged in this bill are higher than in the Senate bill.

Mr. FERRIS. We fixed it as we did before, at a minimum of one-eighth and no maximum. The department can go as high as it desires to do. In the Senate bill they had a maximum fixed at one-eighth, and they could not go beyond that.

Mr. MADDEN. That was the maximum and minimum?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. In looking over this bill I observe, of course, it applies only to the public domain, hence it would not interest those of us who come from the East, except I see in a way that it regulates coal leases. The bill makes it possible to grant a lease for 2,560 acres in amount. Who is to fix the size of these leases?

Mr. FERRIS. The Interior Department.

Mr. ROBBINS. And who determines the royalty that is payable to the Government under the coal leases?

Mr. FERRIS. That is done by contractual relations between the lessee and the lessor. The lessor will be the Interior Department and the lessee will be the mine operator.

Mr. ROBBINS. In preparing a coal lease there are many elements that enter into it other than the size of the lease and the royalty.

Mr. FERRIS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. ROBBINS. The amount that is to be taken out of the acreage, and the details of the lease, the minimum output, the yield, and so forth, must be determined.

Mr. FERRIS. It is done in this way, as I understand it. We have gone into that at great length with the Geological Survey, the Bureau of Mines, and different Interior Department officers. The Interior Department, the Geological Survey, and the Bureau of Mines will have blocked this off in blocks. They have, roughly, about 53,000,000 acres of coal land. They will cut it into blocks ranging in area from 40 to 2,560 acres, and any prospective lessee may come in and apply for these lands if it looks attractive to him. If it does not, he need not take it. If he does get a tract awarded to him, they enter into a contract as to what the royalty shall be, and as to the life of the lease, as to the policy they may pursue in developing the mine, and all the rules and regulations that the department and the lessee may agree upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. FERRIS. I will use two more minutes.

Mr. ROBBINS. I desire to finish this thought. I want the gentleman to explain this, because it relates to the production of coal, which is the most valuable and has the most certain element of value of all these lands.

Mr. FERRIS. Well, I do not know about that.

Mr. ROBBINS. I said certain elements.

Mr. FERRIS. The oil is very valuable; of course coal is, too.

Mr. ROBBINS. They are both worked out on the same general line. Then the Secretary of the Interior divides that, and then after the lease is entered into or before——

Mr. FERRIS. No; the Secretary of the Interior has 6,400,000 acres of oil land, while he has here 53,000,000 acres of coal land. He cuts it up in blocks as the Geological Survey thinks are proper blocks to offer. Then they are offered by competitive bidding or otherwise to anyone who cares to go in and develop it. The oil prospector, the coal developer, comes and makes the application for a certain one of these blocks not exceeding 2,560 acres. They enter into a contractual relation, which is stated in the lease or development contract. He need not take it, but he knows at the time exactly what he is getting. The Interior Department prescribes rules and regulations, subject to such regulations as are prescribed in the bill, for the purpose of development.

Mr. ROBBINS. And the lessee can never obtain title?

Mr. FERRIS. No; this is a leasing proposition.

Mr. ROBBINS. It is a leasing proposition altogether, both as to coal and oil?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; as to oil in toto and as to coal in part. We do not repeal the old coal-land law. I do not think it is of much value on the books, but I think the leasing law will in fact completely supplant it, but for the benefit of tradition and for the benefit of some strong longings out there for patents we will leave the old coal-land law intact.

Mr. ROBBINS. So there is a way by which they can obtain fee to coal lands subject to certain regulations as to——

Mr. FERRIS. That is true. We leave the old system intact, and as to oil we repeal the placer law in toto.

Mr. ROBBINS. I have also the brief referred to by the gentleman from Illinois, telling me of great complaint about the size of these oil leases.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. FERRIS. I yield myself two more minutes in order to answer the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I recall some years ago, I think during President Taft's administration, some serious difficulty about these oil leases in California.

Mr. FERRIS. That is true.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And he was compelled, I think, to make several Executive orders. Is this bill intended to relieve that situation?

Mr. FERRIS. It deals with that situation. This is what happened. I will take a minute or so on that, because most of our hearings were about that very thing. Under the old placer law, which is still the law, eight men could post notices, go and take 160 acres of oil land, or, in reality, 20 acres apiece, and go on taking one tract after another. They could take 500 tracts of 160 acres each and keep taking one after another, and they were proceeding to do that thing. President Taft stepped in and by an Executive order withdrew the great areas of that land we have there, particularly those of the naval reserve, which was being slipped away under this patenting process where a few men were taking up the whole domain. What happened was this: Some very good men in perfect good faith and with an anxiety to develop oil spent perfectly good money in the development of oil. Some had spent hundreds of thousands of dollars to bring water to the land; others had spent thousands of dollars in order to make roads to drill wells. Some were on the verge of getting oil. This withdrawal cut their heads off. These oil men, honestly and honorably and in perfectly good faith, have been trying to get Congress to relieve them, and while the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] was chairman of the committee and I was a member way down at the tail end of the table, we passed an act which we thought would give them relief, and that is what is known as the Pickett law. It was a withdrawal act giving the President full power to withdraw and to protect the rights of those men acting under good faith, but by the rulings and instructions of the department in carrying out the Pickett law that law did not prove to be a blessing, as we thought, but proved to be a hindrance and an obstruction.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. FERRIS. I am afraid I am abusing the patience of the House.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I just want to ask one question.

Mr. FERRIS. I will yield myself a couple of more minutes. I do not wish to monopolize the time here. I only expected to speak for 10 minutes. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it contemplated by this bill that coal production will be increased for the next coming winter in any way?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not know whether or not it will have that effect that soon, if the gentleman will pardon me, but it will certainly give us a better chance to get coal, and it is in the right direction and I hope relief may come as soon as that.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I will.

Mr. ELSTON. The gentleman said in the application of the association for the right to locate mineral oil land that the lands were passing into the hands of very few persons and presumably monopolists. I assume that was under the privilege by which these associations could locate indefinitely, as the gentleman says. Now, that same right under the placer-mining law applies to the location of gold and other precious minerals other than oil, does it not?

Mr. FERRIS. Coal——

Mr. ELSTON. I said gold.

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, yes; that is true. I thought the gentleman said "coal."

Mr. ELSTON. The placer-mining law at present applies to gold and other precious minerals to the unlimited extent the gentleman says it applies to oil which this act would remove.

Mr. FERRIS. That is very true.

Mr. ELSTON. Now, does the gentleman think that the application of that right to locate by association group has resulted in the grouping of all the mineral lands or claims in the hands of a very few, and would the gentleman say in passing that that is true in regard to the oil location?

Mr. FERRIS. I think so as to oil; not true as to gold and so-called precious metals.

Mr. ELSTON. In California, for instance, will the gentleman say that the situation there, so far as the ownership of oil lands is concerned, went into a monopoly held by reason of this privilege granted in a group location?

Mr. FERRIS. I think it was traveling in that direction very fast.

Mr. ELSTON. The gentleman recalls that the Standard Oil Co., for instance, have holdings in proportion of a very slight percentage?

Mr. FERRIS. The Standard Oil appears in very many places and in very many forms, and we do not always know the Standard Oil when we meet it face to face; and I do not want to take any chances on meeting it in disguise.

Mr. ELSTON. I am sure the gentleman is mistaken in his statements that practically the whole of the public domain, so far as mineral oil is concerned, was being grouped in one or two large owners.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. FERRIS. I will yield myself two minutes more.

The gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON] knows a great deal about the oil business in the West to-day, possibly more than I do. But if any law permits eight men, by any sort of process or reasoning or application, to get the whole country, the very fact that it permits it to be done, if it is known to be valuable for oil, will cause it to be done. I am such a firm believer in human nature that I believe that any law so framed is both unwise and dangerous. I object to the placer law from A to Z, and so far as it applies to oil lands it never has had any proper application to the oil. It does not fit. It is a razor that does not shave. It ought to have been repealed before this muddle came. Oil came suddenly and without much preparation. It may have been the best that could be done with the lights before them. It certainly does not have any application to oil.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And was there no way to relieve the situation under the law except by withdrawing it altogether?

Mr. FERRIS. That is all.

Mr. CRAMTON. While it is not very likely that this bill will have any great effect upon the coal situation at an early date, I will ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that it is hoped by untangling the troubles in the West in the oil situation a very decided improvement in the oil situation may be secured and that much new development may be obtained, and thereby the threatened oil famine perhaps averted?

Mr. FERRIS. I think the gentleman has stated it fairly and squarely, and very truthfully.

Mr. CRAMTON. And that is really, at this critical time, the most important feature of the situation.

Mr. FERRIS. I think that is true; and I hope the committee have accomplished a great deal, and I think they have.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve any more time that I may have remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma has 22 minutes left.

Mr. FERRIS. I think it advisable to print herewith my report on this bill. I think it has value for the record.

Mr. FERRIS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Public Lands, having had under consideration the bill (S. 2812) to authorize exploration for and disposition of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shales, or gas, after due and careful consideration thereof, recommends that the bill as herein amended do pass. Senate bill 2812 passed the Senate January 7, 1918, and was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands January 9, 1918. Extended hearings were had on S. 2812, and your committee recommends the striking out of all after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

* * * * * * *

It will be remembered that this legislation has been before Congress actively for the last five years. It will also be remembered that legislation on this subject has twice passed the House without a dissenting vote after full and free consideration of each and every paragraph of the bill. It will be observed that the present House committee substitute follows very closely House bill 3232, which is now on the House Calendar, reported this session of Congress, and which is identical with House bill 406, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, and is almost identical with House bill 16136, Sixty-third Congress, second session.

GENERAL STATEMENT.

This Nation is rich in mineral resources, but for want of adequate legislation too many of our resources are now in a state of nonuse. Existing laws which have become antiquated and out of joint with present-day conditions need a general overhauling. In fact, a system of laws is demanded that are applicable, that are workable, and that will open and develop the West. Such we believe would be accomplished by the enactment of the substitute under consideration It in all things supplants the existing patenting of oil lands and other valuable minerals and substitutes therefor a leasing system controlled by the Federal Government and in the public interest.

This mineral-leasing bill affords a method of leasing on a royalty basis the deposits of mineral fuels and mineral fertilizers, the "public-utility" minerals, contained in the public lands of the United States.

The committee substitute for Senate bill 2812 affords an ample method of leasing to prospective developers on a royalty basis the deposits of mineral fuels contained in the public lands of the United States. Exclusive of coal, this measure applies to the public lands of Alaska as well as the United States proper. There being on the statute books a coal law especially enacted for Alaska, it was thought inadvisable to make this law applicable to Alaska.

The best estimate of the Interior Department discloses that there are approximately 330,000,000 acres of public lands in continental United States and approximately 370,000,000 acres in Alaska, or a grand total of 700,000,000 acres in all. These figures are only approximately correct, due to the fact that entries are constantly being made and lands constantly being relinquished, causing the figures to vary from time to time.

COAL.

The first eight sections of the bill under consideration, coupled with general regulatory provisions appearing later in the measure, deal with coal. Of the 330,000,000 acres of public lands in continental United States, 43,700,000 acres are now withdrawn as unclassified coal lands.

Not all of this area, however, is known to be chiefly valuable for coal and, as classification continues, lands are both eliminated and new tracts included in the coal area. Twenty-five million five hundred thousand acres have already been classified as coal lands. The best available estimate shows that there are from 35,000,000 to 40,000,000 acres of public lands in the United States known to be valuable for coal. The best rough estimate on tonnage is 10,000,000,000 tons bituminous, 30,000,000,000 tons subbituminous, and 50,000,000,000 tons of lignite coal in public ownership in accessible areas, while a rough estimate of the total tonnage for the public-land States, exclusive of Alaska, would be 450,000,000,000 tons, and about 150,000,000,000 tons under private ownership in the Western States, or a total of approximately 600,000,000,000 tons of coal in all.

Method of disposition: Prior to 1873 coal lands were subject to entry under the agricultural land laws, and under this method then and later much of the land went into private ownership, only to find its way into the holdings of the coal trusts, which in turn were ready to, and did, practice extortion on the consumers. Much of the remaining areas of coal lands slipped away in land grants to railroad, wagon road, and other companies. To give one an idea of the enormous areas that have passed into private ownership in this manner it is sufficient to say that 159,125,734 acres of the public domain were granted alone to railroad companies to encourage them in railroad building, to say nothing of the other large areas granted outright to similar enterprises, and these grants include millions of acres of the very best coal lands.

Under the law of 1873 little effort was made to protect the public interest or the rights of the public, and through lack of classification immense areas of coal lands were acquired by individuals and corporations through more or less fraudulent means. While the present system is an improvement over the old methods, it is still unsatisfactory in many respects and in some ways inapplicable to present-day conditions. The demand for better laws to encourage development and prevent speculation is general. The leasing plan will meet this demand and at the same time safeguard all public interests.

Since 1907 coal purchases are made pursuant to prices fixed by the Geological Survey, under regulations approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

From March 3, 1873, to June 30, 1917, only 4,267 coal entries, aggregating 610,516 acres, have been made.

It must be observed that, as enormous as these figures seem, there are yet, without doubt, beds of coal other than those to which reference has been made, possibly containing large areas and considerable tonnage.

Present coal laws not workable: The coal industry is perhaps one of the greatest subjects of monopoly known to minerals, unless it be oil or water power. The present law which permits the fee to pass to railroads, to monopolies, or anyone who would buy it, has worked a great hardship on the consumer and one which can not be undone by the present or many of the generations that are to follow.

The existing laws have permitted the coal near markets and railroad facilities to pass into private ownership and into the hands of the trusts, which are practicing extortion in several Western States to a degree almost inconceivable. The mining of coal may well be termed a rich man's business, and, though the bowels of the earth be laden with coal in the more remote areas, the present law offers nothing workable and no protection to those who would press back into the less accessible fields and open new mines to compete with the mines more favorably situated on lands that are now under private ownership. Much of the land that was acquired by grant, or by acquisition under laws other than coal-land laws, under conditions where little or nothing was paid for it, is either being held for speculation or is now being operated under methods of extortion, and unreasonable prices are being pressed down upon the consumers. Other vast areas of valuable coal lands, exclusive of railroad grants and the like, crept away under preemption, homestead, desert-land, timber, and stone laws, and even scrip locations These areas in turn speedily passed into the hands of the few as a result of dummy entries, prearrangement, and fraud. None but the selfish was favored by this policy—all suffered but the favored few. The policy of the past will do naught but serve the selfish ends of present large corporate holders of coal lands, encourage and benefit the selfish holders, while it hampers and impedes progress and development along all lines.

Necessity for better coal-land laws is recognized by all: The leasing system and the intelligent utilization of the coal yet remaining under Government ownership seems now imperative to every thoughtful person who has given the matter thought. It is believed such a policy will (1) afford competition to the coal monopoly and better prices to consumers; (2) divorce transportation from production—a necessity conceded by most students of the subject; (3) serve as a club to insure better prices in areas where the mines are not opened or leased at all; (4) prevent waste and insure better treatment of labor; (5) enable coal companies to lease an area large enough to justify competition with present monopoly; and (6) prevent favoritism, inasmuch as the leases will be awarded through advertisement and competitive bonus bids.

General provisions: A minimum royalty of 2 cents per ton is fixed, so that the department may adjust each case according to conditions that are present, having due regard for markets, transportation, and other conditions.

It will be observed that the 2 cents per ton is only a minimum charge, and the Interior Department and Government officials may charge as much beyond that as the facts, conditions, and circumstances in each case may warrant.

A rental is provided to insure development.

Safeguards to the public interests are present all through the bill.

The leasing bill, in short, will do with Government property what has been done by all the foremost countries of the world; will do what we have done successfully with the Indian lands, what individuals would do and are doing through the length and breadth of our country. It is wise conservation which bears the approval of Secretary of the Interior Lane, Dr. George Otis Smith, Director of the Geological Survey, the head of the Bureau of Mines, as well as the conservation people from one end of the country to the other.

The leasing system is not new; it is old. It will be objected to by some, just as many other good things have been objected to, but it is right. The parcel post, the rural-route system, and other similar aids were assailed both by the wise and unwise, but they are now conceded to be blessings that have come to stay. The leasing proposition to develop our mineral resources has come, will be adopted, and the system will remain in vogue, for it will be full of safeguards to the public as distinguished from protection of selfish interests.

It is thought the bill will be workable; will afford cheaper coal to consumer; will afford adequate returns to the producer; will prevent monopoly and oppressive methods; will be a boon and a blessing to the workingman, to the producer, and to the consumer. It will be observed that the maximum area for which any one citizen can acquire a lease is 2,560 acres. It will be observed that favoritism in awarding the leases is avoided by first causing the deposits to be carefully appraised and then asking for a bonus by advertisement and competitive bidding. This insures a chance for all. This obviates the usual criticism of favoritism and partiality in the awarding of leases. No railroad shall be a producer of coal except for its own use. It is thought that such separation of transportation from production will go a long way toward stamping out rebates, oppressive methods in shipment, and other existing evils.

It will be observed that the royalty in no case shall be less than 2 cents per ton and may be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior to appropriately fit each case, having due regard for transportation facilities and marketing, as well as other conditions that may need to be considered in any particular case.

The bill is well safeguarded and prevents the lessee from tying up development, inasmuch as he is required to pay an acreage rental and must operate continuously, unless upon application the Secretary of the Interior, acting in the public interests, may modify these requirements, but in no case can the minimum tonnage on which royalty is to be charged be less than the actual rental.

The interests of the homesteaders who are engaged in developing the West are fully protected, and the bill permits a homesteader to secure without royalty, under regulation, a lease for domestic use, so that he may be relieved from the Coal Trust and its oppressive methods. This will be a blessing to the home builder and will afford immediate relief from present conditions until the leasing plan is in full operation.

Cities and municipalities may secure a lease without the payment of royalty on 160 acres for municipal supply, but this must be operated without profit. This will serve as a curb to monopoly, will spare the city from oppression and extortion. Even though the 160-acre tract of coal lands were never used, it would serve as a weapon of protection to those who would or could practice monopoly or extortion upon them.

Oil and Gas.

Sections 9 to 14, inclusive, in conjunction with general provisions appearing later in the bill, deal with the oil and gas deposits.

AREA AND EXTENT LARGELY UNKNOWN.

At present 6,650,000 acres have been withdrawn as valuable for oil and gas. The hearings disclose that some of this land is in litigation; some is sought to be acquired by applicants through dummy entries and other irregular methods. No one can say that the remaining 700,000,000 acres of public land in continental United States and Alaska do or do not contain deposits equally valuable with those already discovered.

Geologists have in the past and will in the future call to their aid science and scientific methods to determine where oil deposits are found. Still it is pretty well admitted on all sides that new and unexplored fields are constantly being found, opened up, and developed, which are unknown and unfathomed, by geologists and scientists. Naught but the rotary drill of the industrious and ambitious oil man can in the last analysis answer definitely where the oil deposits are, what they are, and other indispensable information about them.

OIL AND GAS NOW BEING DEVELOPED UNDER PLACER LAW.

Everyone acquainted with oil production knows how almost totally inadequate the placer law is for oil development. Under the law as it now stands eight citizens can form themselves into an association and take up as such 160 acres. They may then, in succession, without limit and without restraint, take up as many more 160-acre tracts as they like. By this almost criminally lax method the valuable oil deposits of the country, now universally used by rich and poor alike, from cookstove to automobile and from automobile to battleship, have crept away and either have or will find their way into monopolistic control, which means exploitation, extortion, and abuse.

Your Committee on Public Lands are anxious to supplant this unwise, unwholesome, nonworkable law with an intelligent leasing law that will be workable, feasible, and bring about the highest development to the end that monopoly and extortion to the consumer may be stamped out, and at all times conserve the interests of the Federal Government in the property, and to in all things serve in the public interest.

Objects of Bill.

The objects of the bill are (1) to free both producer and consumer from monopoly; (2) to insure competition; (3) to prevent speculation and secure in its stead bona fide prospecting; (4) to protect the prospector; (5) to reward the prospector who does the drilling; (6) to insure an adequate supply of fuel oil for the Navy, which has abandoned the use of coal and will from necessity use larger and larger quantities of oil as long as we have a navy, and (7) to amicably settle litigation that sprang up from the Executive withdrawal by the Government of mineral lands which had partially been developed under the old law.

PROSPECTING PERMIT.

Oil can only be found by drilling; therefore section 9 of the bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to issue a prospector's permit for a period of two years, conditioned on development and actual drilling.

If the prospector holding a Government permit makes a discovery of oil or gas, that discovery under this legislation entitles him to a lease for one-fourth of the area of his permit at a fixed royalty of one-eighth. The permittee shall also be entitled to a preference right to a lease for the remainder of the land in the prospecting permit at such royalty, not less than one-eighth, as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, for such periods and under such other conditions as are fixed for oil or gas leases in this act.

This is thought to be ample reward for the prospector, and at the same time it would turn back to the Government for leasing or for Government use three-fourths of a known oil field, which is believed to be in the interest of conservation, in the public interest, and an assurance that the Government itself will not be left destitute of the necessary fuel, and, further, that the Government, whether with or without adequate antitrust laws, will be able to grapple with the problems of monopoly in oil, which deals with a heavy hand the full length and breadth of the country.

PHOSPHATES.

Sections 15 to 17, inclusive, of the bill deal with phosphates. Soil can not constantly produce without being fed. Its food is fertilizer, and consequently fertilizer is a factor in the cost of living. The conservation of mineral fertilizer is now important, and it will become more so as the virgin soil becomes depleted. In the past large areas have been withdrawn as phosphate lands, but on geologic investigation some of this area has since been restored, leaving approximately 2,870,000 acres. A rough estimate of the number of tons of deposits of phosphate remaining in public ownership would be 20,000,000,000. This mineral occurs and is found largely in Utah, Wyoming, Idaho, Montana, and a little in Florida. The withdrawals of phosphate lands, by States, is as follows:

	Withdrawn.	Restored.	Outstanding.
Florida	122,816	2,819	119,977
Idaho	2,306,019	1,339,642	966,377
Montana	308,975	178,760	130,215
Utah	805,597	544,846	260,751
Wyoming	3,154,227	1,971,411	1,182,816
Total	6,697,634	4,037,498	2,660,371

Phosphate is said to be worth $4.50 per ton at the mine. Thus a rough estimate of the total value of the mined product in its natural state in the public lands of our country would be $90,000,000,000, a sum so vast the mind is scarcely able to grasp its enormity, and probably not expressing the full value of this resource to our farmers, and yet with no adequate law either to protect this resource or to develop it.

In his report on this bill last year Secretary Lane has the following to say with regard to phosphates:

"The largest production of phosphates up to the present time has been in the State of Florida, with considerable quantities also produced in Tennessee and South Carolina. It is from these States that the phosphates so greatly needed by the farmers of this country have been largely exported.

"Discoveries of vast deposits of phosphate rock in Idaho, Montana, Utah, and Wyoming were made in 1906. In 1908 all the public lands within this area believed to contain phosphate deposits and not included within prior valid mining claims were withdrawn from entry, and have since remained withdrawn, awaiting the enactment of laws which would be better adapted to the development of these deposits and the protection of the public rights and interests involved.

"Phosphates occurring in rock, as they do in the West, can be acquired under the lode-mining laws at present, or could if they were open for entry. Where the deposits are in placer formation, as is the case in Florida, they are disposed of under the placer mining laws.

"These laws are inadequate to protect the public interests and rights in these deposits. They provide no method for preventing monopoly of holding or for securing development and continuous working of mines. If disposed of under the present laws, these deposits may be monopolized and withheld from development and use in any manner which may best serve the interests of monopoly, and which would inevitably mean the maintenance of high prices to the consumers.

"This bill provides for the retention by the United States of the title to all phosphate lands and the leasing of the lands for development and production of phosphates. It offers such reward as is expected to encourage exploration and discovery, gives liberal inducement to private enterprise to search out and apply better methods to the production and manufacture of phosphates, and at the same time insures such competition in production as is believed to furnish complete safeguarding of the public against the extortions of monopoly.

"Tracts of not more than 2,560 acres of phosphate lands are to be leased for development.

"The Government is to receive a royalty of at least 2 per cent of the value of the phosphates produced, at the point of production, with a minimum rental of $1 an acre per annum. Leases are to be indeterminate, with full regulation of methods of mining, prevention of waste, monopoly, and minimum production. It is left to the Secretary of the Interior to make such terms in the lease concerning the time for development and the use of surface lands for location of factories and for other purposes as may be desirable to encourage location of new industries and protect the public interests."

With all these resources no adequate public or mineral land policy is in vogue: With all this enormous wealth decreed to us by nature and by purchase, with all the mineral deposits slumbering in the ground untouched, yet the Government, with all its patriotism, with all its wisdom, has as yet no well-defined, well-digested, rational policy for the development of the mineral resources contained in its public lands.

Our laws are in many respects crude, irreconcilable, inefficient, without uniformity, confusing to the brain of the miner, impossible of interpretation by the layman, a jargon of inconsistencies, retarding progress and development. Most of our so-called mineral laws in truth and in fact are not laws at all but are simply a jargon of Executive orders, rulings, interpretations, and decisions made by different bureau chiefs and clerks in the ramifications of the various bureaus of the Interior Department.

It is gratifying to observe that Secretary Lane and the present administration have put their hands to the plow and are utilizing the experience of the administrations that have preceded us in formulating a land policy which will make clear to the miner and to the public the relative rights of all concerned. It is both gratifying and pleasing to know that Secretary Lane and the present administration have the hearty cooperation of the preceding administrations and their friends, both in and out of Congress, in the working out and bringing about of a solution of these more than vexatious questions in the handling of the 700,000,000 acres of public domain in the United States and Alaska.

It should be distinctly understood that the withdrawal of large areas of land by the previous administrations has only been a preliminary step to, but in no sense a solution of, the public-land policy. It is thought that Secretary Lane is entitled to unusual credit for taking up the task where his predecessors left it in aiding the Public Lands Committee to bring into Congress a measure for the solution of these problems, which is thought to be feasible, acceptable, and workable, and which it is believed will insure a proper development and an intelligent utilization of our mineral resources, without waste and without permitting monopoly or injustice to be pressed down upon those who would develop the West, or upon the interests of the public, who are entitled to reap the benefits.

RELIEF PROVISION RELATING TO OIL CLAIMANTS WHO HAD PARTIALLY DEVELOPED LANDS WHEN THE EXECUTIVE ORDER OF WITHDRAWAL WAS ISSUED.

On September 27, 1909, the then President Taft made an Executive order withdrawing large areas of public lands in the West on which oil prospectors were actually engaged and in many instances actually producing oil. There was much controversy in the West as to whether the President of the United States under the then existing laws had authority to withdraw such lands that had valid, bona fide claimants on them seeking to develop the lands and produce oil from them under the then existing law. Able lawyers advised the claimants, some gratuitously and some for pay, but it was uniformly referred to and assented to throughout the West that the then President Taft had no authority to make such withdrawals. The oil claimants, not in a spirit of disobedience but in pursuance of what they thought were their rights, at very great expense and hazard, and very great loss in some instances, and in still other instances with very great profit, went on expending money and developing this territory.

The matter was litigated in the courts and carried to the highest tribunal, the Supreme Court of the United States, which seven years afterwards upheld the withdrawal order and decided that the President did have the right to make the withdrawal order that he did make.

This left the oil men in a precarious condition. They must either go on litigating with their Government or come to Congress and make an appeal to Congress for some equitable adjustment of their difficulties. Some pursued one course, some another, but the bulk of them, however, have been appealing to Congress for the last five years to give them some relief. Congress has always given an attentive ear to their claims and usually has sympathized with them in an effort to save their investment and preserve their rights, but it is believed that in no instance has anyone desired that they should have rights which would in any way be unfair to the Government or antagonistic to the public interests.

This particular relief phase of the bill has had extended attention not only from both Committees on the Public Lands of the House and Senate but from the Departments of Interior, Navy, and Justice.

The combined judgment of the three departments mentioned and the combined judgment of the Committee on Public Lands is set forth in the following specific proviso, which is a proviso to section 12 of the bill, and which reads as follows:

"Provided, That any claimant who, either in person or through his predecessor in interest, entered upon any of the lands embraced within the Executive order of withdrawal dated September 27, 1909, prior to July 3, 1910, for the purpose of prospecting for oil or gas, and thereupon commenced development work thereon, and thereafter prosecuted such work to a discovery of oil or gas, shall be entitled to lease from the United States the producing oil or gas well or wells resulting from such work at a royalty of not less than one-eighth of all the oil and gas produced and saved therefrom, together with an area of land sufficient for operation thereof, but without the right to drill any other or additional wells thereon except as may be authorized by the President, and no wells shall be drilled on lands subject to the terms of this act within 660 feet of any such leased well without the consent of the lessee thereof: Provided further, That where the President shall determine that it is to the public interest, he may lease the remainder of any such claim to the claimant upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe: And provided further, That all such claimants shall pay, in such manner as the President may determine, to the United States an amount equal to not less than the value when produced of one-eighth of all the oil and gas already produced and saved from such well or wells: And provided further, That no claimant whose well or wells may be involved in any suit brought by the United States or in any application for patent shall be entitled to a lease under this proviso, unless within six months after approval of this act he shall relinquish to the United States all rights claimed by him in such suit or application, unless the President shall further extend such time. No person who has been guilty of any fraud, or who had knowledge or reasonable grounds to know of any fraud, or who has not acted honestly and in good faith, shall be entitled to a lease under the provisions of this act."

It is contended by the oil men that this is a harsh settlement with them of their rights, which they insist were bona fide and acquired in the greatest hazard, and that it does not accord them adequate relief.

The Interior Department has at all times contended that every right of the Government should be conserved in the public interest. However, they have always thought that the Government should not deal unjustly with these pioneers on the public domain who have converted a worthless desert into a producing oil field which affords an adequate supply of oil for the Navy and the Republic in general.

The Department of Justice has been vigilant, has commenced and prosecuted some 55 suits, most of which are still pending in the courts, seeking to recover these lands for the Government. In order to accomplish this the Department of Justice has availed itself of technical frailties of procedure in acquiring these lands under the placer-mining law. In other cases the department found open abuses of the law in their efforts to acquire patent thereto.

The Department of the Navy has at all times been vigilant, active, and determined in their efforts to conserve an adequate fuel supply for the United States.

The interests of the three departments above mentioned have been so acute and so interlaced and interwoven in this intricate matter, involving litigation, receivership, and millions of dollars' worth of impounded oil and property, that your committee requested representatives of each of these departments to appear at the hearings, and they did actually sit in and participate in all the hearings had upon the bill, and acknowledgment is hereby made to them for their help and assistance in bringing about the above solution of this intricate and troublesome question, which is thought to be a solution which in all things is believed to be fair to the Government and to the development.

This view was reached after the most untiring investigation, after the most tedious and laborious efforts expended toward its solution by the departments, by the Committee on the Public Lands, and by the oil men themselves, who have been ably represented and have likewise been vigilant, active, and energetic in the preservation of their every right and the securement of all the relief that it was possible for them to obtain.

OIL SHALE LANDS.

In section 14 provision is made for the leasing and development of deposits of oil shale belonging to the United States. From evidence submitted at the hearing it appears that the known oil-shale deposits of the United States aggregate something like 15,000 square miles, in Colorado, Utah, and Wyoming. There are also areas of oil shale known in Nevada, California, Arizona, and Oregon. Oil is not extracted from shale through wells, but the shale must be mined like coal and subjected to a process of distillation, producing ultimately crude oil, with sulphate of ammonia and paraffin as by-products. It is estimated that the production of oil from the better class of shales will approximate 47 gallons of crude oil to the ton. The mining and manufacture of oil and other products from these shales are somewhat analogous to the mining and reduction of low-grade ores. It can be accomplished only through the adoption of expensive and complicated manufacturing processes and by handling the shales in large quantities. It is estimated that a complete plant having a capacity of 1,000 tons of shale per day will cost from $2,200,000 to $2,500,000.

Oil has been produced from shales for many years in Scotland and other places in Europe, and some production is being had in Canada, where, while a small royalty is exacted from the developer, a bonus is paid by the Government of 1½ cents per gallon of crude oil. Your committee regards the oil-shale deposits as a valuable Government asset and susceptible, under proper encouragement, of producing vast quantities of crude oil and its by-products, but only through liberal treatment and through a somewhat different method than that employed in the extraction of oil from wells. Section 15, therefore, authorizes the leasing of the oil-shale deposits in areas not exceeding 5,120 acres of land, upon such royalties as may be specified in the leases, with the right in the Secretary of the Interior to waive the payment of any royalty and rental during the first five years of any lease, the royalties to be subject to readjustment at the end of each 20-year period. There are reported to be numerous locations upon these lands under the general placer-mining laws, and provisions have been adopted that any person having a valid location of such minerals prior to January 1, 1918, may, upon relinquishing his claim, be entitled to a lease under the provisions of the section.

In view of the fact that no commercial quantity or any appreciable amount of shale oil has ever been produced in this country, nor any standardized process of production has yet been evolved or recommended or agreed upon in this country by the Bureau of Mines or anyone else, and it has not yet been demonstrated that the oil-shale industry can be made commercially profitable, in view of the location and conditions of the oil shale in this country, and that it will require the hazard and employment of many millions of dollars, and the long application of expert experience and intelligence of the highest order to develop the industry to a productive and profitable state, for the purpose of encouraging the experiment upon and the development of the oil-shale industry in this country, your committee very earnestly recommends exceedingly liberal conditions to those who are willing, under the supervision of the Government, to undertake the risk and expenditure of the necessary time and money to make the production of shale oil possible.

ALASKAN OIL PROVISIONS.

Section 29 of the bill is devoted to Alaska. Special consideration was given to Alaskan oil fields. The demand for distinct recognition by Alaska oil claimants is based upon conditions peculiar to Alaska, grouped as follows:

(a) Distance of the fields from commercial centers.
(b) Time required in the shipment of necessary materials.
(c) Difficulties in the transportation of materials by land in the oil fields.
(d) The short season in which work can be done.
(e) Scarcity of needed materials on ground.
(f) Rapid decay and destruction of materials during long nonuse.
(g) High cost of labor and maintenance in these fields.
(h) Absence of housing quarters for employees.
(i) Unusual difficulties encountered in drilling.
(j) Small production of individual wells.
(k) Great distances between the oil areas.
(l) Difficulties and cost of transportation of oil produced.
(m) Difficulties in storing and refining oil produced.
(n) The present scarcity and high price of fuels.
(o) Shipping necessary to transport needed fuel to Alaska.
(p) Taking of oil from the California and other United States fields to Alaska for fuel.
(q) Encouragement to the mining interests in furnishing fuel for mining and milling ores.
(r) Local fuel for Alaskan industries generally.
(t) Recognition of present claimants, occupying but 1 per cent of Alaskan oil fields, will encourage development of the 1,000,000 acres of known and classified oil lands.

The evidence shows some 60 claims in the principal Alaskan fields located long prior to any withdrawal order. The claimants, their assignees and successors, have in good faith held and worked these claims uncontested nearly 20 years and have expended thereon an aggregate of approximately $1,000,000.

No discovery of oil in wells has been made on many of these claims, but by reason of faults and folds the surface in many places is marked by large springs or seepages of live oil and gas issuing from the rock. This seepage, the evidence shows, is a positive visual production of oil, amounting, in many instances, to measurable quantities in short spaces of time. The original locators and their assignees have in good faith relied upon these seepages as discoveries sufficient, with the improvements made and work performed, to validate their claims. These seepages have been used as guides in drilling wells, and every well drilled at or in relation to a seepage has proved of commercial value.

The Geological Survey authoritatively states that "if any drilling is to be done it will first be advisable to search out those areas where the presence of seepages gives the best hope of favorable results." (Bull. 592, p. 400.)

A Federal judge in the recent Consolidated Mutual Oil case said:

"While it is possible that at times oil may be found issuing from the surface of the ground, in which case discovery, of course, may be made without difficulty or expense, it is a matter of common knowledge that almost always drilling is essential to such discovery."

Another Federal judge recently said:

"It would not do to say that a discovery of seepage oil upon a mining location could not in any case constitute a discovery."

The author of the official compilation of the United States mining laws and decisions has recently published a digest of the authorities on this subject as follows:

"Lands subject to oil locations must be chiefly valuable for the oil content. Discovery of oil on a claim is necessary. Discovery of oil in commercially valuable quantities is not required. The discovery required is to determine if the land is chiefly valuable for oil and not to determine the value of the oil deposit. The sufficiency of a discovery is a question of fact. The rule as to the sufficiency of a discovery is more liberal as applied to placer than to lode claims. The rule as to the sufficiency of discovery on placer claims is made more liberal on oil locations by the petroleum act.

"The willingness of a prospector to expend money and labor in development is an element in determining the sufficiency of a discovery. Oil seepage in appreciable quantity may answer as to the actual presence of oil. The sufficiency of a discovery may be established by presumptive evidence in connection with the presence of any appreciable quantity of oil."

The evidence shows that the lands in the fields are practically worthless for other purposes. There is little valuable timber and no discoveries of other minerals have been made thereon. Under the act of February 11, 1897 (29 Stats., 526), the locators could assume from the seepage that the lands contained petroleum and were chiefly valuable therefor.

The testimony and Government reports show that the Alaskan fields, although large in area, are much broken and faulted, thereby shifting the oil to widely separated pools or reservoirs presumably along faults and folds of the same general field. The probable extent of these fields is in the neighborhood of 1,000,000 acres, with the possibility that even larger areas will be discovered if prospecting is reasonably encouraged. These and other reasons given make necessary a larger number of tracts for operation to justify the initial investment and average the incident risks.

Drilling processes are slow, necessarily expensive, and the wells are small, averaging about five barrels a day.

The testimony demonstrated that immediate development is vital as a war emergency to continue and protect the production of fish, gold, and copper, that are dependent upon local oil production.

From these existing and partially developed claims, oil for the emergency requirements of the Alaskan fisheries and mines must come. A quarter billion cans of Alaska salmon needed at the fighting front are almost wholly dependent on this supply of oil. Liberal treatment and inducements are necessary to encourage immediate development for a supply of fuel to these industries, and the pioneers in the field should have a larger margin of safety than those in more regulated, accessible, and uniform fields, where all conditions are far more favorable. The advantages given are essential to quick production to meet the emergency and the present Alaskan requirements.

A similar proviso has recently passed the Senate; and the House has twice recognized the conditions peculiar to Alaska in previous consideration of this measure.

For these and other reasons that space will forbid the giving, the committee recognizes the validity of these claims and has attempted to give liberal and just treatment to Alaska claimants. Under the conditions briefly reviewed, and as established at the hearing, it is our unanimous conclusion that any Alaskan who can measure up to the requirements of this section is entitled to the benefits of its provisions. Its beneficial effect and its simplicity is such that the men who have discovered and opened up a virgin resource can immediately determine their present status, and, if within its provisions, may safely and expeditiously proceed to meet the present emergency.

DEPARTMENTAL REPORTS ON RELIEF SECTION OF H. R. 3232 AND S. 2812.

JANUARY 8, 1918.

Hon. FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary of the Interior.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Will you be good enough to furnish the committee a report of your views on the following amendment:

"That any claimant who, either in person or through his predecessor in interest, entered upon any of the lands embraced within the Executive order of withdrawal dated September 27, 1909, prior to July 3, 1910, honestly and in good faith for the purpose of prospecting for oil or gas, and thereupon commenced discovery work thereon, and thereafter prosecuted such work to a discovery of oil or gas shall be entitled to lease from the United States any producing oil or gas well resulting from such work, at a royalty of not less than one-eighth of all the oil and gas produced therefrom, together with an area of land sufficient for the operation thereof, but without the right to drill any other or additional wells: Provided, That such claimant shall first pay to the United States an amount equal to not less than the value of one-eighth of all the oil and gas already produced from such well: And provided further, That this act shall not apply to any well involved in any suit brought by the United States, or in any application for patent, unless within 90 days after the approval of this act the claimant shall relinquish to the United States all rights claimed by him in such suit or application: And provided further, That all such leases shall be made and the amount to be paid for oil and gas already produced shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior under appropriate rules and regulations."

Will you be good enough to let the report show whether or not, in your opinion, this is all the relief that the oil claimants are entitled to, and report to us fully in the premises? The Committee on the Public Lands are anxious to do full justice to the bona fide claimants in the West, but are anxious that no Government property of any sort shall be sacrificed in an effort to so aid them.

I would like to have this report at your very earliest convenience, and also advise us if, in your opinion, it would be proper for us to strike out all relief provided in the Senate bill and insert this instead.

With great respect, I am,

Very sincerely, yours,

SCOTT FERRIS.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 29, 1918.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. FERRIS: I am in receipt of your request for report upon H. R. 3232, commonly known as the general leasing bill, particularly with respect to the so-called remedial provisions relating to oil and gas claims within withdrawn areas, and embodied in the proviso to section 12 of the bill.

H. R. 3232 is identical with H. R. 406, Sixty-fourth Congress, as favorably reported by your committee and passed by the House of Representatives. I reported upon that bill at length, and I do not think I can add anything to statements contained in previous reports. With respect to the so-called relief provisions, I recommend that the proviso to section 12 be eliminated from the bill and the following inserted in lieu thereof:

"That any claimant who, either in person or through his predecessor in interest, entered upon any of the lands embraced within the Executive order of withdrawal dated September 27, 1909, prior to July 3, 1910, honestly and in good faith for the purpose of prospecting for oil or gas, and thereupon commenced discovery work thereon, and thereafter prosecuted such work to a discovery of oil or gas, shall be entitled to lease from the United States any producing oil or gas well resulting from such work at a royalty of not less than one-eighth of all the oil and gas produced therefrom, together with an area of land sufficient for the operation thereof, but without the right to drill any other or additional wells: Provided, That such claimant shall first pay to the United States an amount equal to not less than the value of one-eighth of all the oil and gas already produced from such well: And provided further, That this act shall not apply to any well involved in any suit brought by the United States, or in any application for patent, unless within 90 days after the approval of this act the claimant shall relinquish to the United States all rights claimed by him in such suit or application: And provided further, That all such leases shall be made and the amount to be paid for oil and gas already produced shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior under appropriate rules and regulations."

With this amendment, I recommend that H. R. 3232 be enacted.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE, Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, April 24, 1917.

MY DEAR MR. FERRIS: I am in receipt of your request for report and recommendation upon H. R. 3232, a bill to authorize exploration for and disposition of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, or sodium deposits owned by the United States.

This bill is identical with H. R. 16136, passed by the House of Representatives September 23, 1914, and H. R. 406, passed by the House January 15, 1916, and the enactment of which was recommended by this department. The merits and purposes of the measure were fully set forth in previous reports and in hearings had before the Committee on the Public Lands. The bill was regarded as an important measure for the utilization of the resources described in time of peace and as a measure of preparedness for war.

The existing state of war, in my opinion, renders the enactment of the bill necessary and vital.

Potash is an essential in the manufacture of munitions and of vital importance as a fertilizer of the soil for increased food production. According to a pamphlet entitled the "Potash industry," published by the German Kali Workers, Chicago, Ill., practically all the potash produced prior to the war came from the mines of the German Empire, and in the year 1911 its consumption by the principal countries of the world was as follows: Germany, 422,341 metric tons, or 49.8 per cent of the total production; United States, 237,453 metric tons, or 28 per cent of the total production; Holland, 34,375 metric tons; Great Britain, 21,217 metric tons.

Examples of increase in production of agricultural crops cited in this pamphlet showed yield of corn on an acre in Indiana fertilized with potash 75.7 bushels, without fertilizer 32.1 bushels; of sweet potatoes in South Carolina with potash fertilizer 250 bushels per acre, without potash fertilizer 122½ bushels per acre; pears in Indiana with potash fertilizer 205.8 bushels, unfertilized 58.8 bushels; beans in Michigan with potash fertilizer 22.7 bushels per acre, unfertilized 5 bushels.

The foreign supply of potash is, of course, now not available and the amount of potash produced in the United States is at present negligible. One hundred and thirty thousand six hundred and twenty-nine acres of public lands containing potash are withdrawn from entry. This area includes Searles Lake, Cal., one of the largest known deposits in the world. I am informed that two experimental plants for the production of potash located on the shores of this lake have recently been completed. They have direct outside railroad connections, and it is alleged that they can not only start to work at once but that their capacity can be largely increased if this legislation be had and leases granted.

Another important natural resource which would be developed under this bill is the phosphate deposits of Idaho, Wyoming, Utah, Montana, and other public-land areas. Approximately 2,600,000 acres containing these deposits are now withdrawn from development. Phosphate is an exceedingly valuable element in the fertilization of lands, and the development and cheapening of this resource would undoubtedly add largely to our agricultural production.

The importance of ample supplies of gasoline and oil for the Navy, for airplanes, for motor trucks, and other uses connected with successful prosecution of war can hardly be overestimated. Six million four hundred and ninety-one thousand one hundred and forty-five acres of public land believed to contain oil are withdrawn from development. A part of this area is proven territory, in direct touch with pipe lines and refineries, and the products could be made immediately available by the enactment of this measure. I therefore earnestly recommend that H. R. 3232 be enacted at the earliest practicable moment as a war measure.

Cordially, yours, FRANKLIN K. LANE, Secretary.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 3, 1916.

MY DEAR MR. FERRIS: In response to your request for report upon H. R. 406, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, a bill "to authorize exploration for and disposition of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, and sodium," I have to advise that, with slight amendments, designed to perfect the measure, it is similar to H. R. 16136, Sixty-third Congress, second session, recommended by this department, by the Committee on the Public Lands, and passed by the House September 23, 1914.

The measure deals with deposits in the public domain which may be classified as fuel and fertilizer minerals, and proposes to encourage and authorize the development of those deposits when found in public lands, national forests, and certain reservations.

Large areas of coal and oil lands have been withdrawn from entry to save their exploitation by monopoly and to await the enactment of legislation better adapted to their development. Large areas of phosphates and potash needed for agricultural development are unworked because of inadequacy of present laws. The purpose of this bill is to open up all of these deposits for use, on such terms and conditions as will prevent their waste, secure proper methods of operation, encourage exploration and development, and protect the public. The methods provided are designed to make it easy and profitable to mine and market these minerals and to discourage the holding of unworked mineral lands for speculative purposes. It offers to the operator of small capital the same opportunity as the large corporation. It will, it is believed, be an incentive to the development and to the establishment of new industries. The general system proposed has been applied successfully and satisfactorily to the production of oil from Indian lands. In oil and coal lands held in private ownership the leasing system is common practice, and several of the States have provided for the leasing of coal deposits in their school lands.

Section 1 of the bill provides that the existing coal-land laws of the United States may be taken advantage of by those who desire to secure those deposits, or that same may be leased as provided in this bill. One reason for continuing existing coal-land laws in force is that there are many hundred coal claims already initiated under the old law; another reason is that it will give opportunity of choice to the citizen, who can either buy or lease at his option. It is generally believed that large coal operators will prefer to lease, but it was thought that those who prefer to obtain a smaller area under existing laws of purchase should be accorded an opportunity so to do.

Section 3 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to lease coal lands or deposits in blocks or tracts of from 40 to 2,560 acres to any qualified applicant, and allows railroads to secure leases for limited areas of coal lands for railroad uses and purposes, but not for any other purpose.

Section 4 permits the enlargement of leases to an area not exceeding the maximum of 2,560 acres.

Section 5 permits the consolidation of small leases into a new lease of not exceeding the maximum of 2,560 acres.

Section 6 is designed to meet situations where sufficient contiguous lands to make up a lease are not available.

Section 7 fixes rentals and royalties and provides that the leases shall be for indeterminate periods, upon condition of continued operation, subject, however, to readjustment of terms and conditions at the end of 20-year periods.

Section 8 is designed to permit the mining of limited amounts of coal for local or municipal use without payment of royalty.

Sections 9 to 13 deal with deposits of oil and gas in the public lands.

Section 9 provides for the issuance of a prospecting permit which will give to any qualified applicant the exclusive right for a fixed period to prospect upon areas varying from 640 to 2,560 acres of land, the permittee being required to perform a specific amount of development work. This provision of law is designed for the protection of those exploring for oil who, under present laws, have no such protection and who may be deprived of the fruits of their labors by others.

Under section 10 the permittee who shall have discovered deposits of oil or gas is given a patent for one-fourth of the area included in his prospecting permit.

Section 11 contains provisions designed to prevent waste, protect adjacent lands, and secure the properly restricted development of lands embraced in permits, leases, and patents issued under this act. If enacted, it will obviate some of the abuses which now exist with respect to the development of the oil and gas lands, among them the sapping of oil deposits from adjacent lands and the destruction of same through lack of care of the wells.

Section 12 provides that all deposits of oil or gas and unentered lands containing the same shall be subject to lease through competitive bidding in areas not exceeding 640 acres, upon payment of an annual rental, to be accredited against royalties for the current year, and of a royalty fixed in the lease, which shall not be less than one-tenth in amount or value of the production. Leases are to be for a period of 20 years, with a preferential right to renew same for successive periods of 10 years, upon reasonable terms and conditions. The proviso to the section is remedial in its nature, designed to meet existing conditions in the oil fields. There are at present many developed oil wells upon the public domain held by those whose claims are invalid under existing law, for the reason that no discoveries were made prior to the date of the withdrawal of the lands from entry or because the original locators were "dummies." These persons have no legal rights, but their large expenditures and the ensuing development present an equitable situation which this proviso is designed to relieve by giving them the right to secure a lease to the deposits so developed upon payment of a royalty of not less than one-eighth of the oil or gas.

Section 13 deals with rights of way through the public land and reservations of the United States for oil or gas pipe lines, providing that such rights shall be granted only upon the condition that the lines shall be operated and maintained as common carriers.

Sections 14 to 17 deal with deposits of phosphate or phosphate rock.

Section 14 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to lease the minerals under such regulations as he may adopt, and section 15 provides that the leases shall not exceed 2,560 acres of land in compact form.

Section 16 provides that leases of phosphates may be for indeterminate periods, subject to adjustment at the end of each 20-year period, leases to be conditioned upon the payment of an annual rental, which is to be accredited against royalties for each year and upon the payment of a royalty of not less than 2 per cent of the gross value of the output at the mine.

Section 17 grants the right to use a limited area of public land for the development, treatment, and removal of the phosphate deposits.

Sections 18 to 20 deal with deposits of potassium or sodium. These minerals are generally found in the desert areas of the United States, frequently in former lake beds, and their discovery and development are of great public importance.

Section 18 authorizes the granting of a prospecting permit somewhat similar to that provided in the case of oil or gas.

Section 19 grants to the person who shall have discovered one of the minerals claimed under a prospecting permit a patent for a part of the lands included in his permit and provides that all other lands known to contain such deposits shall be leased by the Secretary of the Interior under general regulations and in areas not exceeding 2,560 acres, the leases to be conditioned upon the payment of an annual rental, which may be accredited against royalties as they accrue for that year, and upon the payment of a royalty of not less than 2 per cent of the gross value of the output at the point of shipment. Leases are to be for indeterminate periods, upon condition that at the end of each 20-year period readjustment of terms and conditions may be made.

Section 20 grants the right to use a limited tract of unoccupied public land for camp sites, refining works, or other purposes connected with the development of potassium or sodium.

Sections 21 to 31 are general provisions applicable in whole or in part to all of the deposits described in the bill.

Section 21 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to insert in any prospecting permit appropriate provisions for cancellation of the permit upon failure of the permittee to exercise due diligence in the prospecting work.

Section 22 limits the number of leases which may be held under the act and is designed to avoid monopoly by preventing interlocking interests through stock holdings or through any other direct or indirect means.

Section 23 provides against monopolies in the extraction and resale of the deposits.

Section 24 authorizes the reservation of the right to permit the joint or several use of easements or rights of way through the leased lands, and also permits the United States, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, to dispose of the surface, with a mineral reservation, and subject to the use of so much of the surface as may be necessary by the lessee in extracting or removing the mineral deposits.

Section 25 is also designed to prevent the indirect acquisition of the minerals by monopoly, by providing that there shall be no assignments or subleases except with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior. This section also contains provisions to prevent waste and to insure the exercise of reasonable diligence, skill, and care in operating the property. These and similar provisions have the ultimate object of securing to the consumer the various products at a reasonable price and the preventing of same from passing into monopolistic control.

Section 26 provides for appropriate forfeiture, but safeguards the interests of the lessee by requiring such proceedings to be in the United States court for the district in which the lands or deposits are situate.

Section 27 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to require statements or reports from lessees.

Section 28 provides that the act shall apply to deposits in lands which may have been disposed of by the United States under laws which reserved the coal, oil, gas, phosphate, potassium, or sodium, with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same.

Section 29 devotes the proceeds from leases, first, to the reclamation fund for the construction of irrigation works in the Western States. Upon return of this money, as required by the reclamation law, 50 per cent of the proceeds will go to the State within the boundaries of which the leased lands or deposits were located for the support of public educational institutions or for the construction and maintenance of public roads.

Some of the reasons for these provisions are as follows: In 1902 Congress set apart proceeds of the sales of public lands in the Western States for a reclamation fund. Some 30 projects were started and nearly $100,000,000 have already been expended therein. It will take many millions more to complete them. The receipts from the sales of public lands have diminished greatly in late years, partly owing to the fact that agricultural homestead lands are free to settlers, and partly due to the fact that large areas have been reserved by the Government for forest reserves, water-power sites, national monuments, etc. In 1910 Congress authorized the loan of $20,000,000 to the reclamation fund, upon condition that it be repaid. The situation is, therefore, that present receipts from the sale of public lands are inadequate to complete existing projects or to repay the loan above described. It is essential, therefore, that in order that this may be accomplished, as well as that new projects may be hereafter undertaken, if deemed advisable, that the proceeds from these leases shall go, as have receipts from all other public lands in the past, into the reclamation fund. As stated, the bill provides that upon return of the money 50 per cent shall go to the States for public purposes, an equitable provision when it is considered that in most of the States affected there is need for better educational facilities and improved public highways.

Section 30 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to prescribe necessary rules and regulations, and section 31 is the repealing clause, also containing provisions to permit claims, valid and existent under present law, to be perfected thereunder.

The present coal-land laws, which provide for the sale in areas not exceeding 160 acres to an individual, 320 acres to an association, and not exceeding 640 acres to four or more persons who have spent $5,000 in development work, at an appraised price of not less than $10 or $20 per acre, according to location, are unsatisfactory in many respects. The maximum area is too small to permit of modern and economical development, and in many instances makes cheap production impossible. It also requires a considerable initial investment by the operator, whereas under a leasing system he would only be required to pay for the coal on a royalty basis as it is extracted. The bill also makes provision for the prevention of waste and the safeguarding of the interests of those engaged in mining work.

Oil and gas lands or deposits are now subject to location and entry under the placer mining laws. These laws have been generally unsatisfactory both from the standpoint of the prospectors and operators and of the Government. There is nothing in the present law to protect the prospector during the preliminary period, when through the expenditure of large capital he is engaged in drilling, and the limitations as to acreage contained in the existing laws are also a temptation to evade, through the use of dummy locations.

A leasing measure permitting the acquisition of larger areas, protecting the developer and requiring payment to be made only upon production will not only conform more nearly to the customs of private development, but will, it is believed, be fairer to both the operator and the Government.

The largest production of phosphates up to the present time has been in the State of Florida, with considerable quantities also produced in Tennessee and South Carolina. Immense deposits of this valuable fertilizer mineral were found in Idaho, Montana, Utah, and Wyoming in 1906, but these lands have been withdrawn since 1908, awaiting the enactment of laws adapted to their development.

As with the oil and gas, the lode and placer mining laws of the United States do not fit these phosphate deposits, and this measure will, in the opinion of the department, secure the development of these valuable deposits under reasonable terms and conditions. The same is true of the potassium or sodium deposits found chiefly in the Great Basin in the western United States, which are not being developed under existing laws, but whose extraction is of great public importance. In fact, the necessity for encouraging the discovery and production of these fertilizer minerals can hardly be overstated. They are badly needed to renew worn-out soils and to increase or maintain our agricultural production. In the past the United States has imported large quantities of these minerals, and this is not good economy when large deposits lie unworked and unutilized in the public lands.

Existing laws, in so far as applicable to the minerals described in the bill, have not secured development. It is believed that H. R. 406, if enacted, will encourage and secure their exploitation under conditions beneficial to all. I therefore earnestly recommend that the measure be enacted.

Cordially, yours, FRANKLIN K. LANE.

Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

JANUARY 8, 1918.

Hon. T. W. GREGORY,
Attorney General of the United States, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GEN. GREGORY: Will you be good enough to furnish the committee a report of your views on the following amendment to H. R. 3232?

"That any claimant who, either in person or through his predecessor in interest, entered upon any of the lands embraced within the Executive order of withdrawal dated September 27, 1909, prior to July 3, 1910, honestly and in good faith, for the purpose of prospecting for oil or gas, and thereupon commenced discovery work thereon, and thereafter prosecuted such work to a discovery of oil or gas, shall be entitled to lease from the United States any producing oil or gas well resulting from such work at a royalty of not less than one-eighth of all the oil and gas produced therefrom, together with an area of land sufficient for the operation thereof, but without the right to drill any other or additional well: Provided, That such claimant shall first pay to the United States an amount equal to not less than the value of one-eighth of all the oil and gas already produced from such well: And provided further, That this act shall not apply to any well involved in any suit brought by the United States or in any application for patent unless within 90 days after the approval of this act the claimant shall relinquish to the United States all rights claimed by him in such suit or application: And provided further, That all such leases shall be made and the amount to be paid for oil and gas already produced shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior under appropriate rules and regulations."

Will you be good enough to let the report show whether or not in your opinion this is all the relief that the oil claimants are entitled to, and report to us fully in the premises? The Committee on the Public Lands are anxious to do full justice to the bona fide claimants in the West, but are anxious that no Government property of any sort shall be sacrificed in an effort to so aid them.

I would like to have this report at your very earliest convenience; and also advise us if in your opinion it would be proper for us to strike out all relief provided in the Senate bill and insert this instead.

With great respect, I am,
Very sincerely, yours,

SCOTT FERRIS.

JANUARY 19, 1918.

Hon. T. W. GREGORY,
The Attorney General.

MY DEAR GEN. GREGORY: I beg to inclose herewith H. R. 3232 and the report thereon. I beg also to inclose Senate 2812 for your consideration and report.

I most respectfully request you to examine the House bill above mentioned critically, with a view of ascertaining if there is anything in the bill that will in any way prejudice the rights of the Government. This bill has twice passed the House of Representatives after critical and careful investigation without a dissenting vote. It has at all times borne a favorable recommendation from the Interior Department. It has on three occasions received the unanimous report of the House Committee on the Public Lands.

Nevertheless, recognizing the importance of the bill and your wide knowledge on the subject gathered from the conduct of suits in connection with some of these lands, I am anxious that you give us a full report thereon.

I understand that the so-called release provision in section 12, page 12, you yourself, the Department of the Interior, and the Navy Department have agreed upon a substitute for that provision, which I hope you will also include in your report.

May I also ask you to make a separate report on Senate 2812, for, as you are aware, the Senate bill is being insisted upon by the oil men and also strenuously contended for by certain of the Senators? I hope you will give us, for use of the committee, your several objections to the Senate bill, as both bills are properly before the committee for consideration and your views on both bills will be helpful.

I am making a similar request of Secretary Lane, who is the administrative officer for these lands, and also of Secretary Daniels, who is interested in certain of the lands in the naval reserve included therein. I would like to have this report at the earliest possible moment, so we can dispose of this legislation.

Very respectfully, yours,

SCOTT FERRIS.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 25, 1918.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. FERRIS: I am in receipt of your letter of January 19, inclosing for my consideration H. R. 3232 and S. 2812, relating to the disposition of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium. You request me to examine the House bill critically, with a view to ascertaining whether there is anything in it that will in any way prejudice the rights of the Government. You also desire a statement of my objections to the Senate bill, which you say is being insisted upon by the oil men and also strenuously contended for by certain of the Senators.

By your letter to me of January 8, 1918, you stated that the Committee on Public Lands was desirous of doing full justice to the bona fide claimants in the West, but was also anxious that no Government property of any sort should be sacrified in an effort to aid them, and in this connection you requested my views on a proposed amendment, which you quoted. You particularly requested my opinion as to whether this proposed amendment would provide all the relief to which the oil claimants are entitled and as to whether it might properly be substituted for all relief provided in Senate bill 2812. At the same time you addressed similar letters to the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of the Navy. The proposed amendment reads as follows:

"That any claimant who, either in person or through his predecessor in interest, entered upon any of the lands embraced within the Executive order of withdrawal dated September 27, 1909, prior to July 3, 1910, honestly and in good faith for the purpose of prospecting for oil or gas, and thereupon commenced discovery work thereon, and thereafter prosecuted such work to a discovery of oil or gas, shall be entitled to lease from the United States any producing oil or gas well resulting from such work, at a royalty of not less than one-eighth of all the oil and gas produced therefrom, together with an area of land sufficient for the operation thereof, but without the right to drill any other or additional wells: Provided, That such claimant shall first pay to the United States an amount equal to not less than the value of one-eighth of all the oil and gas already produced from such well: And provided further, That this act shall not apply to any well involved in any suit brought by the United States, or in any application for patent, unless within 90 days after the approval of this act the claimant shall relinquish to the United States all rights claimed by him in such suit or application: And provided further, That all such leases shall be made and the amount to be paid for oil and gas already produced shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior under appropriate rules and regulations."

Following your letter of January 8, the subject was considered and discussed among the two Secretaries and myself, and we concurred in the following views:

I. That there should be substituted for section 16 of S. 2812 the amendment set out in your letter of January 8.

That there should be legislation which would protect the Government as to lands claimed by it adjacent to the wells leased under the proposed section, in order that the oil on these lands might not be exhausted by the operation of the wells leased; that this could be done by providing for the lease or operation by the Government of such adjacent lands; that a similar provision should also be made for the lease or operation of wells and lands recovered by the Government; that incidental to the changes above recommended the words "oil, gas," in line 17, on page 25, in section 30 of S. 2812, should be omitted, as well as the following words in the succeeding lines 18 and 19: "except those reserved for the Navy." It was assumed that section 11 of S. 2812, which provides for prospecting permits, was not intended to apply to established wells and proven oil territory.

II. That the power of the President to withdraw additional lands from entry in case the necessities of the Government require it should not be limited, and, therefore, there should be omitted from S. 2812 the last portion of section 30, reading as follows:

"And none of such lands shall hereafter be withdrawn from the operation of this act for a longer period than one year without the consent of Congress."

That for a like reason section 34 of S. 2812 should be omitted.

III. That the proviso appearing in the last part of section 32 of S. 2812 should be omitted, as it would permit persons whose applications for patents had not been acted on by the Interior Department to put down additional wells; that this would be particularly objectionable as to parties who are charged by the Government with fraud and the validity of whose claims had not been determined by the Interior Department or any court. The proviso reads as follows:

"Provided, however, That in order to assist in the production of oil to meet the present emergency pending the final determination of a right to a patent to any oil or gas lands, or the actual granting of a lease upon oil or gas lands, as herein provided, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to permit increased production of oil under the terms of agreements authorized under the provisions of said act approved August 25, 1914, which act is hereby continued in force for such purpose."

IV. That the words "which work may be done on said locations successively," appearing in section 17 of S. 2812, in lines 3 and 4, page 15, should be omitted, for the reason that the question of successive development of locations is now being judicially considered in the courts of California and by the Interior Department and that, in our judgment, it was undesirable that these issues should be confused or affected by this language which might be construed as legislative construction of the principles involved.

V. That the words "actual knowledge," appearing in the same section (sec. 17) of S. 2812, in line 16 of page 16, should be substituted by the word "notice," as the language used in the bill was in conflict with the long-established principles of law governing the rights of innocent purchasers in good faith for a valuable consideration without notice.

Speaking for myself alone, I think the proposed amendment set out in your letter of the 8th would afford adequate relief to those who in good faith, acting on the advice of counsel that the withdrawal order was unauthorized, or relying on the decisions of the inferior courts to the same effect, expended money in the development of oil and gas wells. Regarding it as a compromise measure I approve it, but it is the limit of liberality to which I think the Government should go in dealing with claimants who are without rights under existing law.

In response to your request in regard to H. R. 3232, I will say:

1. The only compromise measure provided in that bill for settlement of the litigation involving withdrawn oil lands appears in the concluding proviso of section 12 (pp. 12 and 13), which, in granting concessions to claimants to these oil lands, goes far beyond the provisions of section 16 of S. 2812. As to this I can only repeat the view already expressed that the proposed amendment of section 16 of S. 2812, set out in your letter to me of January 8, should be substituted for the proviso just referred to, and that this would necessitate a further provision for lease or operation by the Government of lands adjacent to the wells leased under the provisions of the substitute, and also of wells and lands recovered by the Government.

2. If suggestion 1 should be adopted, then the words "and in lands withdrawn or reserved for military or naval uses or purposes," appearing in lines 7 and 8 of section 1 of H. R. 3232, should be omitted.

3. I assume that section 9 is intended to provide for prospecting and not for the development of lands on which wells are in operation or which is known, because of geological formation or otherwise, to be oil lands, and therefore language should be used in this section which would exclude from its operation all withdrawn oil lands, or some other provision should be inserted in section 9 which would prevent the application of its liberal prospecting provisions to lands known to be oil or gas lands.

4. I confess that I do not quite understand the following language used in the first portion of section 12:

"That all deposits of oil or gas and the unentered lands containing the same and classified as oil or gas lands, or proven to contain such deposits, except, however, those embraced in any prospecting permit during the life of the same, those patented or for which application for patent by the permittee is pending under the provisions hereof, may be leased by the Secretary of the Interior through competitive bidding, etc."

(a) I do not understand just what is meant by "unentered lands." If by this is meant lands not embraced in applications for patents, the provision goes too far, because it would include land upon which a valid discovery has been made and to which the right to a patent has vested, though not applied for, under the existing mining law.

(b) In using the words "classified as oil or gas lands" I do not quite understand how, when, and by whom they are to be "classified," and therefore I do not catch just what is meant by this expression.

(c) By the expression "proven to contain such deposits," I do not quite understand in what manner, by whom, and when the lands are to be "proven."

(d) Among the exceptions are lands "embraced in any prospecting permit during the life of the same." If the prospecting permit provided for in section 9 did not apply to withdrawn oil lands, or if section 9 is restricted in accordance with the suggestion I have made in section 3 hereof, then this exception would seem to be superfluous; but if any restriction is placed on the operation of section 9, this exception would seem to me to be entirely too far-reaching.

(e) The next exception is of those lands "patented or for which application for patent by the permittee is pending under the provisions hereof." I suppose this is intended to apply to lands being prospected under section 9, and if the safeguards I have suggested in regard to that section in section 3 hereof are provided I see no objection to this exception.

If this exception is intended to embrace patents and applications for patents heretofore made under existing law instead of "under the provisions hereof," it is unobjectionable as to patents. As to existing applications which may hereafter be denied, the lands embraced in them would probably fall within the class that the Government would want to lease or operate.

5. The proviso appearing at the end of section 29 indicates that the bill as drawn was intended to apply to naval reserves, and this would seem to be in conflict with the language appearing in lines 7 and 8 of section 1 of the bill which I referred to in section 2 hereof.

For the use of the committee I am preparing a schedule showing every aspect to the litigation referred to. This will be ready in a day or two.

Very sincerely, yours,

T. W. GREGORY,
Attorney General.

The SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SECRETARY DANIELS: Will you be good enough to furnish the committee a report of your views on the following amendment to H. R. 3232?

"That any claimant who, either in person or through his predecessor in interest, entered upon any of the lands embraced within the Executive order of withdrawal dated September 27, 1909, prior to July 3, 1910, honestly and in good faith, for the purpose of prospecting for oil or gas, and thereupon commenced the discovery work thereon, and thereafter prosecuted such work to a discovery of oil or gas, shall be entitled to lease from the United States any producing oil or gas wells resulting from such work, at a royalty of not less than one-eighth of all the oil and gas produced therefrom, together with an area of land sufficient for the operation thereof, but without the right to drill any other or additional wells: Provided, That such claimant shall first pay to the United States an amount equal to not less than the value of one-eighth of all the oil and gas already produced from such well: And provided further, That this act shall not apply to any well involved in any suit brought by the United States or in any application for patent, unless within 90 days after the approval of this act the claimant shall relinquish to the United States all rights claimed by him in such suit or application: And provided further, That all such leases shall be made, and the amount to be paid for oil and gas already produced shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior under appropriate rules and regulations."

Will you be good enough to let the report show whether or not in your opinion this is all the relief that the oil claimants are entitled to, and report to us fully in the premises? The Committee on the Public Lands are anxious to do full justice to the bona fide claimants in the West, but are anxious that no Government property of any sort shall be sacrificed in an effort to so aid them.

I would like to have this report at your very earliest convenience, and also advise us if in your opinion it would be proper for us to strike out all relief provided in the Senate bill and insert this instead.

With great respect, I am, very sincerely, yours,

SCOTT FERRIS.

JANUARY 19, 1918.

Hon. JOSEPHUS DANIELS,
Secretary of the Navy.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY DANIELS: I beg to inclose herewith H. R. 3232 and the report thereon. This bill, as you are aware, has twice passed the House without a dissenting vote. This bill has also been three times reported from the House Public Lands Committee without a dissenting vote. This bill has also enjoyed complete approval from the Interior Department during the two preceding Congresses and has been favorably reported on again this Congress. I understand that yourself, Secretary Lane, and Attorney General Gregory have agreed upon a substitute for the relief provision in section 12, at the bottom of page 12 and top of page 13.

Will you be good enough to give us your views on this particular amendment and any objections or recommendations you may have as to any part of the other provisions contained in the bill?

I am also inclosing you herewith Senate bill 2812, which I wish you would examine critically and report to us any objections or recommendations you have thereon. I do this for the purpose that the oil men and the Senate Public Lands Committee are insisting upon the retention of sections 16 and 17 of the Senate bill, and I would be glad to have the benefit of your objections thereto so that both sides of the controversy can be submitted to the committee.

I know you will pardon me for asking for this report as soon as possible so that I may make proper presentation of it to the committee, with the hope of making an early disposition of it.

With great respect, I am,
Very sincerely, yours,

SCOTT FERRIS.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 22, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I beg your indulgence for the delay in making reply to your communications of January 14, 1918, and January 19, 1918. I assure you that it was not due to any failure to realize the importance of the matter.

With regard to the general features of the bill, I would prefer not to be called on to comment. While the Navy Department is deeply concerned in the intelligent development and proper conservation of the Nation's petroleum supply, which enters so vitally, directly and indirectly, into the Navy's requirements, I have repeatedly stated that I do not consider it within my province to make suggestions as to the method of disposing of public lands, except in so far as that action would affect the naval reserves.

The bill as it passed the Senate excluded the naval reserves, and whatever may have been my personal belief in the so-called equities of the claimants, it was not within my province to enter into a discussion of the bill.

In my letter of December 13, 1917, I pointed out what are believed to be certain ambiguities in the wording of H. R. 3232 with reference to the naval reserves. Should it be the intention of your committee, as I believe is from the wording of section 1, that this act is not intended to apply to the naval petroleum reserves, and the wording was so amended as to make it clear that the naval reserves were excluded, I would offer no opposition to the bill.

With regard to sections 16 and 17 of S. 2812 and the proposed substitute section as given in your communication of January 8, my position is fully outlined by the Navy Department's comment of February, 1917, on a similar amendment suggested by Senator SWANSON:

"This department has always maintained that those who entered upon the public land after its withdrawal did so in violation of a valid order, on the chance that the order would be held invalid; and that to grant such men legislative relief would be to reward disregard of law at the expense of the persons who respected the order—the Navy, and the whole Nation.

"In regard to the naval petroleum reserves, we have always insisted that if real equities existed, as is contended, they should be ascertained by a court or a commission and cared for by compensation in money, and the land set aside as a naval reserve should be held for the use of the Navy. I have held the view, and am still of the opinion, that any question of equity with reference to the naval reserve lands ought to be settled in an independent measure and not as an amendment to the general leasing bill. But if it is deemed necessary in the pending legislation to care for, by a method other than the payment of money, the asserted equities of those who, on account of legal advice or lack of knowledge of the law, in good faith, invested money in the development of these lands, I am of the opinion that the proposed amendment would afford substantial relief to all such claimants. It would at the same time save a large part of the land for the Navy.

"This would, in my judgment, give them a greater measure of relief than they are entitled to, but solely because I am unwilling for this contention to prevent the passage of the general leasing bill, which is designed to open to development the natural resources of the West, I shall be satisfied if the measure of relief is limited to that proposed by Senator SWANSON.

"While I consider that this provision offers very liberal relief, I am disposed not to interpose any objection to its adoption in order that the controversy may be expeditiously settled, but justice to the Navy would not permit me to assent to any change that would grant a greater measure of relief or that would authorize a lease to those who do not, within 90 days after the approval of the act, relinquish all rights claimed by them."

There has been nothing in the meantime to change my views in the matter, and it is as a compromise, and only as a compromise, that I would feel that I could assent to the provisions of the proposed substitute.

Sincerely, yours, JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, December 11, 1917.

MY DEAR MR. FERRIS: I am in receipt of your request for report upon H. R. 3232, a bill to authorize exploration for and disposition of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, or sodium.

The measure is similar to H. R. 16139, Sixty-third Congress, second session, passed by the House of Representatives September 23, 1914, and identical with H. R. 406, Sixty-fourth Congress, passed by the House January 15, 1916. I submitted a favorable report on the latter measure January 3, 1916, and the statements made in that report are applicable to the present measure, H. R. 3232, except that provision has been made for the leasing of deposits of potassium in the public lands by the act of Congress approved October 2, 1917 (Public, No. 49). The provisions of the bill relating to this mineral should therefore be eliminated from H. R. 3232.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE, Secretary.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENTAL REPORT.

It will be observed, in reading the following favorable report from Secretary Lane, that he makes reference to certain sections in H. R. 406, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, and that these sections are not applicable to the present bill (S. 2812) under consideration. However, as Secretary Lane's report thereon deals with the same subject matter it is printed herewith at length, and is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 3, 1916.

MY DEAR MR. FERRIS: In response to your request for report upon H. R. 406, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, a bill "To authorize exploration for and disposition of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, potassium, and sodium," I have to advise that, with slight amendments, designed to perfect the measure, it is similar to H. R. 16136, Sixty-third Congress, second session, recommended by this department, by the Committee on the Public Lands, and passed by the House September 23, 1914.

The measure deals with deposits in the public domain which may be classified as fuel and fertilizer minerals, and proposes to encourage and authorize the development of those deposits when found in public lands, national forests, and certain reservations.

Large areas of coal and oil lands have been withdrawn from entry to save their exploitation by monopoly and to await the enactment of legislation better adapted to their development. Large areas of phosphates and potash needed for agricultural development are unworked because of the inadequacy of present laws. The purpose of this bill is to open up all of these deposits for use, on such terms and conditions as will prevent their waste, secure proper methods of operation, encourage exploration and development, and protect the public. The methods provided are designed to make it easy and profitable to mine and market these minerals and to discourage the holding of unworked mineral lands for speculative purposes. It offers to the operator of small capital the same opportunity as the large corporation. It will, it is believed, be an incentive to the development and to the establishment of new industries. The general system proposed has been applied successfully and satisfactorily to the production of oil from Indian lands. In oil and coal lands held in private ownership the leasing system is common practice, and several of the States have provided for the leasing of coal deposits in their school lands.

Section 1 of the bill provides that the existing coal-land laws of the United States may be taken advantage of by those who desire to secure those deposits, or that same may be leased as provided in this bill. One reason for continuing existing coal-land laws in force is that there are many hundred coal claims already initiated under the old law; another reason is that it will give opportunity of choice to the citizen, who can either buy or lease at his option. It is generally believed that large coal operators will prefer to lease, but it was thought that those who prefer to obtain a smaller area under existing laws of purchase should be accorded an opportunity so to do.

Section 3 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to lease coal lands or deposits in blocks or tracts of from 40 to 2,560 acres to any qualified applicant, and allows railroads to secure leases for limited areas of coal lands for railroad uses and purposes, but not for any other purpose.

Section 4 permits the enlargement of leases to an area not exceeding the maximum of 2,560 acres.

Section 5 permits the consolidation of small leases into a new lease of not exceeding the maximum of 2,560 acres.

Section 6 is designed to meet situations where sufficient contiguous lands to make up a lease are not available.

Section 7 fixes rentals and royalties and provides that the leases shall be for indeterminate periods, upon condition of continued operation, subject, however, to readjustment of terms and conditions at the end of 20-year periods.

Section 8 is designed to permit the mining of limited amounts of coal for local or municipal use, without payment of royalty.

Sections 9 to 13 deal with deposits of oil and gas in the public lands.

Section 9 provides for the issuance of a prospecting permit which will give to any qualified applicant the exclusive right for a fixed period to prospect upon areas varying from 640 to 2,560 acres of land, the permittee being required to perform a specific amount of development work. This provision of law is designed for the protection of those exploring for oil, who, under present laws, have no such protection and who may be deprived of the fruits of their labors by others.

Upon section 10 the permittee who shall have discovered deposits of oil or gas is given a patent for one-fourth of the area included in his prospecting permit.

Section 11 contains provisions designed to prevent waste, protect adjacent lands, and secure the properly restricted development of lands embraced in permits, leases, and patents issued under this act. If enacted, it will obviate some of the abuses which now exist with respect to the development of the oil and gas lands, among them the sapping of oil deposits from adjacent lands and the destruction of same through lack of care of the wells.

Section 12 provides that all deposits of oil or gas and unentered lands containing the same shall be subject to lease through competitive bidding in areas not exceeding 640 acres, upon payment of an annual rental to be accredited against royalties for the current year, and of a royalty fixed in the lease, which shall not be less than one-tenth in amount or value of the production. Leases are to be for a period of 20 years, with a preferential right to renew same for successive periods of 10 years, upon reasonable terms and conditions. The proviso to the section is remedial in its nature, designed to meet existing conditions in the oil fields. There are at present many developed oil wells upon the public domain held by those whose claims are invalid under existing law, for the reason that no discoveries were made prior to the date of the withdrawal of the lands from entry or because the original locators were "dummies." These persons have no legal rights, but their large expenditures and the ensuing development present an equitable situation which this proviso is designed to relieve by giving them the right to secure a lease to the deposits so developed, upon payment of a royalty of not less than one-eighth of the oil or gas.

Section 13 deals with rights of way through the public land and reservations of the United States for oil or gas pipe lines, providing that such rights shall be granted only upon the condition that the lines shall be operated and maintained as common carriers.

Sections 14 to 17 deal with deposits of phosphate or phosphate rock.

Section 14 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to lease the minerals under such regulations as he may adopt, and section 15 provides that the leases shall not exceed 2,560 acres of land in compact form.

Section 16 provides that leases of phosphates may be for indeterminate periods, subject to adjustment at the end of each 20-year period, leases to be conditioned upon the payment of an annual rental which is to be accredited against royalties for each year and upon the payment of a royalty of not less than 2 per cent of the gross value of the output at the mine.

Section 17 grants the right to use a limited area of public land for the development, treatment, and removal of the phosphate deposits.

Sections 18 to 20 deal with deposits of potassium or sodium. These minerals are generally found in the desert areas of the United States, frequently in former lake beds, and their discovery and development are of great public importance.

Section 18 authorizes the granting of a prospecting permit somewhat similar to that provided in the case of oil or gas.

Section 19 grants to the person who shall have discovered one of the minerals claimed under a prospecting permit a patent for a part of the lands included in his permit and provides that all other lands known to contain such deposits shall be leased by the Secretary of the Interior under general regulations and in areas not exceeding 2,560 acres, the leases to be conditioned upon the payment of an annual rental which may be accredited against royalties as they accrue for that year, and upon the payment of a royalty of not less than 2 per cent of the gross value of the output at the point of shipment. Leases are to be for indeterminate periods, upon condition that at the end of each 20-year period readjustment of terms and conditions may be made.

Section 20 grants the right to use a limited tract of unoccupied public land for camp sites, refining works, or other purposes connected with the development of potassium or sodium.

Sections 21 to 31 are general provisions applicable in whole or in part to all of the deposits described in the bill.

Section 21 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to insert in any prospecting permit appropriate provisions for cancellation of the permit upon failure of the permittee to exercise due diligence in the prospecting work.

Section 22 limits the number of leases which may be held under the act and is designed to avoid monopoly by preventing interlocking interests through stock holdings or through any other direct or indirect means.

Section 23 provides against monopolies in the extraction and resale of the deposits.

Section 24 authorizes the reservation of the right to permit the joint or several use of easements or rights of way through the leased lands, and also permits the United States, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, to dispose of the surface, with a mineral reservation, and subject to the use of so much of the surface as may be necessary by the lessee in extracting or removing the mineral deposits.

Section 25 is also designed to prevent the indirect acquisition of the minerals by a monopoly by providing that there shall be no assignments or subleases except with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior. This section also contains provisions to prevent waste and to insure the exercise of reasonable diligence, skill, and care in operating the property. These and similar provisions have the ultimate object of securing to the consumer the various products at a reasonable price and the preventing of same from passing into monopolistic control.

Section 26 provides for appropriate forfeiture, but safeguards the interests of the lessee by requiring such proceedings to be in the United States court for the district in which the lands or deposits are situate.

Section 27 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to require statements or reports from lessees.

Section 28 provides that the act shall apply to deposits in lands which may have been disposed of by the United States under laws which reserved the coal, oil, gas, phosphate, potassium, or sodium, with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same.

Section 29 devotes the proceeds from leases, first, to the reclamation fund for the construction of irrigation works in the Western States. Upon return of this money, as required by the reclamation law, 50 per cent of the proceeds will go to the State within the boundaries of which the leased lands or deposits were located for the support of public educational institutions or for the construction and maintenance of public roads.

Some of the reasons for these provisions are as follows: In 1902 Congress set apart proceeds of the sales of public lands in the Western States for a reclamation fund. Some 30 projects were started and nearly $100,000,000 have already been expended therein. It will take many millions more to complete them. The receipts from the sales of public lands have diminished greatly in late years, partly owing to the fact that agricultural homestead lands are free to settlers, and partly due to the fact that large areas have been reserved by the Government for forest reserves, water-power sites, national monuments, etc. In 1910 Congress authorized the loan of $20,000,000 to the reclamation fund upon condition that it be repaid. The situation is therefore that present receipts from the sale of public lands are inadequate to complete existing projects or to repay the loan above described. It is essential, therefore, that in order that this may be accomplished, as well as that new projects may be hereafter undertaken, if deemed advisable, that the proceeds from these leases shall go, as have receipts from all other public lands in the past, into the reclamation fund. As stated, the bill provides that upon return of the money 50 per cent shall go to the States for public purposes, an equitable provision when it is considered that in most of the States affected there is need for better educational facilities and improved public highways.

Section 30 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to prescribe necessary rules and regulations, and section 31 is the repealing clause, also containing provisions to permit claims, valid and existing under present law, to be perfected thereunder.

The present coal-land laws, which provide for the sale in areas not exceeding 160 acres to an individual, 320 acres to an association, and not exceeding 640 acres to four or more persons who have spent $5,000 in development work, at an appraised price of not less than $10 or $20 per acre, according to location, are unsatisfactory in many respects. The maximum area is too small to permit of modern and economical development, and in many instances makes cheap production impossible. It also requires a considerable initial investment by the operator, whereas under a leasing system he would only be required to pay for the coal on a royalty basis as it is extracted. The bill also makes provision for the prevention of waste and the safeguarding of the interests of those engaged in mining work.

Oil and gas lands or deposits are now subject to location and entry under the placer mining laws. These laws have been generally unsatisfactory both from the standpoint of the prospectors and operators and of the Government. There is nothing in the present law to protect the prospector during the preliminary period, when through the expenditure of large capital he is engaged in drilling, and the limitations as to acreage contained in the existing laws are also a temptation to evade, through the use of dummy locations.

A leasing measure permitting the acquisition of larger areas, protecting the developer, and requiring payment to be made only upon production will not only conform more nearly to the customs of private development but will, it is believed, be fairer to both the operator and the Government.

The largest production of phosphates up to the present time has been in the State of Florida, with considerable quantities also produced in Tennessee and South Carolina. Immense deposits of this valuable fertilizer mineral were found in Idaho, Montana, Utah, and Wyoming in 1906, but these lands have been withdrawn since 1908, awaiting the enactment of laws adapted to their development.

As with the oil and gas, the lode and placer mining laws of the United States do not fit these phosphate deposits, and this measure will, in the opinion of the department, secure the development of these valuable deposits under reasonable terms and conditions. The same is true of the potassium or sodium deposits found chiefly in the Great Basin in the western United States, which are not being developed under existing laws, but whose extraction is of great public importance. In fact, the necessity for encouraging the discovery and production of these fertilizer minerals can hardly be overstated. They are badly needed to renew worn-out soils and to increase or maintain our agricultural production. In the past the United States has imported large quantities of these minerals, and this is not good economy when large deposits lie unworked and unutilized in the public lands.

Existing laws, in so far as applicable to the minerals described in the bill, have not secured development. It is believed that H. R. 406, if enacted, will encourage and secure their exploitation under conditions beneficial to all. I therefore earnestly recommend that the measure be enacted.

Cordially, yours, FRANKLIN K. LANE.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, at this late day any defense of the placer act so far as it relates to oil lands is superfluous and useless. It is proposed to lease lands rather than patent them. The question of the character of the placer law is a question behind us, except as it applies to certain unperfected claims, and I did not intend to discuss that feature at all; but gentlemen insist during the course of the debate on making statements that are not borne out by the facts with regard to the placer law as it applies to oil lands, and therefore a few words on that subject may not be amiss. It is true that under that law eight men can locate great areas. However, we have had that law as applied to oil lands on the statute books for over 20 years, and in all the United States there has been patented but a few thousand acres of oil lands. We do not know the exact acreage, but probably between ten and twelve thousand acres. Now, a law that allows men to grab everything in sight, as gentlemen insist, ought to produce results in ownership of more than that amount of acreage in that length of time.

The fact is that the oil-placer act was a very good law, and is to-day, as it applies to oil lands, and we would get large development under it if the withdrawals were restored. It is a law that is self-enforcing by reason of the fact that if a man does not get busy and keep busy some one is likely to take his claim away from him. The expense of drilling an oil well is so considerable, the expense of the development of oil land is so large, the chances are so great, that under that statute men have not generally been able to hold any considerable acreages of land, however much they may have filed upon at one time. I have seen hundreds of thousands of acres filed on and all the claims evaporated within 12 months. But I did not intend to discuss that feature of the situation. We are proposing to go to a leasing law, and so the question of whether the placer act as applied to oil land is a good one is largely behind us.

I am somewhat responsible for the placer act, having introduced the bill at the time when the Interior Department held we had no law under which oil lands could be patented, and therefore I am inclined to rise to its defense.

THE PENDING BILL.

Now, as to the bill before us, those who are familiar with the conditions under which legislation is initiated, developed, and perfected realize that conditions may arise under which proposed legislation may be presented in a form that is not entirely satisfactory in all its details even to a majority of those who in a way stand sponsor for it as members of a committee reporting it.

Conditions may arise, particularly in the case of legislation which is oft proposed and long deferred relative to certain features of which there are strong and marked differences of opinion, in which precedent, the complicated character of the problems to be solved, and the desire to reach some common ground of agreement relative to sharply controverted questions, produce a legislative situation not clearly intelligible to one not familiar with the complexities of the problems to be met or the tangle of conflicting opinions out of which it is impossible to secure an ideal situation.

These observations may, I think, be made applicable to the pending coal and oil leasing bill without betraying any confidences or involving any criticism.

I doubt if anyone fully approves all the provisions of this bill, and the objections to it relate about equally to what it contains and what it omits, what it proposes and what it fails to provide for.

This is the third time the House has attempted legislation along these lines, and naturally the committee having the matter in charge is disposed to adhere in the main to the plan and purpose of the measure as heretofore presented, and that the committee has done.

It is true that since the subject was discussed at former sessions the situation has materially changed. When a similar measure was before the House in the Sixty-third Congress and again in the Sixty-fourth, there was not any very general or widespread activity in oil development on the public lands, and what development there was was not as seriously affected as now by the withdrawal from entry of lands proven, assumed, or believed to afford favorable opportunities for oil production.

In the situation thus formerly presented comparatively little interest was taken by the people of the public-land States in the general provisions of the bill as they related to oil lands, or those provisions of the bill which affected the holdings of the ordinary locator or claimant outside of withdrawals or in recently withdrawn areas where the effect of withdrawals was not clearly defined or generally known.

In the last two or three years, however, there has been a very great increase in activity, in location, and development of public lands believed to contain oil, and withdrawals have regularly followed on the heels of location and development. In this situation a very large number of people, particularly in Wyoming and adjacent States, have become aroused to their very lively interest in the general provisions of the oil-leasing bill and in the provisions intended to reasonably protect those who have gone on the public domain in good faith for the purpose of discovering oil. It has come to be generally realized that claims were seriously threatened by a measure which asserts an adverse claim on the part of the Government likely to place in serious jeopardy the rights of those who have not been able to make such a discovery as under the rulings of the Interior Department entitle them to a patent.

On the two former occasions when the matter has been before Congress I have endeavored to point out the faults of omission and commission in the legislation, for I have clearly foreseen the unfortunate results that would arise out of its enactment as proposed, both in denial of the rights of locators and in undue restriction of opportunities for satisfactory future development, but the task was a difficult one owing to the lack of general interest to which I have referred among the comparatively few people then affected as locators or prospectors in oil development.

The entire subject of oil development on the public lands from the beginning of the definite attempts to enact leasing legislation, and particularly since the decision of the Supreme Court in the Mid-West case effecting the early withdrawals, has been largely colored and confused by the conditions surrounding a very few but valuable tracts of oil land in California and Wyoming.

At the time of the hearings on the first bill the discussion was confined largely to the relief provisions of the bill as affecting the California lands. There was some discussion of the similar Wyoming situation, but comparatively little. The committee listened to the arguments at very great length with regard to the California situation. I think I was the only one, other than the representatives of the department, who appeared before the committee to discuss the general provisions of the bill and the relief feature as it affected the small or ordinary claimant or locator.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. RAKER. Does the gentleman refer to the first hearings on the bill some years ago?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Really as a matter of fact the question of the situation in California was never fully presented to the committee until this last hearing. We had hearings on the general leasing bill, it is true, but the hearings were not had on the California situation until the last three months.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has been a member of the committee all the time and knows a great deal about it, but the gentleman has evidently forgotten that there was a considerable hearing on the California situation before the committee at the time the bill was first considered. When the bill was discussed in the House, I think I was the only one who seriously criticized its provisions at that time on the floor.

The Senate took no action on that bill. Later, in the next Congress, the bill was again taken up, and again our California friends appeared and presented their views, and the Wyoming situation, so far as it affected certain large interests, was presented at length. Between the first and the second period the Supreme Court decision in the so-called Mid-West case had been rendered, so that when the bill was taken up by the committee the second time interests of great value were in very serious jeopardy. They were in the lion's jaw, and they needed relief. They had secured some temporary relief, to which the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] has referred, but they needed further relief and definite relief under the bill.

The hearings were largely on the subject of relief for the large operators, representing a very limited acreage compared with the total acreage of oil lands, but of very great value.

Again, I think I was the only one who appeared before the committee, other than the department people, to discuss the general features of the bill, and again I presented the case of the small locator and operator.

Again the bill was discussed in the House, and again I called attention to some of the errors of the bill as I saw them, and of the failure to provide adequate relief, particularly for the small and ordinary locator, the man who was not able to come here to present his case, but who represented the very great majority of all the acreage that was placed in jeopardy by the legislation. Gentlemen will recall we discussed that bill at length and secured some important amendments, but still the bill as it passed the House was far from satisfactory.

Again the bill failed in the Senate.

In the present Congress the Senate reported a bill based substantially on the House bill, but with some amendments that improved it and some modifications that did not improve it.

The House committee has taken that bill, stricken out all after the enacting clause, and inserted the bill largely in the form in which it passed the House twice, with, however, some important amendments and modifications.

When the bill was before the House on previous occasions I offered a number of amendments. Some of those amendments were adopted. More of them were not. The bill, as now presented by the Public Lands Committee, has adopted several of the propositions which I presented, either before the committee or on the floor of the House, on the two former occasions when the legislation was considered. It has adopted the plan which I had insisted upon from the beginning and which the oil men approved—that this oil-leasing bill should be an oil-leasing bill in fact as well as in name, and that there should be no provision for patenting under its prospecting or permit feature. One very important and rather surprising modification of the bill as now presented is contained in section 12 in lieu of certain provisions in section 12 of the bill as it passed the House before. The new provision is much less favorable than the former provision. It proposes relief so ridiculously inadequate that one not familiar with the conflicting influences that have brought about the change would be sorely puzzled to know how it happened.

One thing is certain, the new provisions of relief in section 12 are not only entirely inadequate, manifestly unfair and unjust to those affected by them, but they would not provide a condition favorable to the public interest.

While this is all true, it is also true that under existing circumstances and conditions it will not, in all probability, be possible to change these provisions in the House. I think those most interested in and affected by these provisions realize this fact. This is one of the features of the legislation which, it seems, must be cured, if at all, in the conference.

During the recent hearings, as the members of the committee know, the Wyoming folks having become thoroughly aroused to the situation, realizing their very great interest in the legislation as locators and operators, appeared before the committee and presented their views at length. I want to say for the committee, on behalf of our Wyoming people and all others, that a committee never listened with greater patience, with better good nature, to a long drawn out and long continued hearing and argument than in the case of the hearing on this bill. I can only regard, as I am sure many others will, that after having listened to that discussion, to the arguments very earnestly and eloquently and forcibly presented, the committee were not more fully converted than they appear to have been, judged by the result as presented in the bill. I shall continue to believe that the majority of the committee were more fully convinced in their judgment than is evidenced by the bill as now presented to us.

I have given a good deal of thought to the question as to what my attitude shall be toward this measure. I am one of the few western men who long since came to the conclusion that oil and coal leasing legislation was inevitable, and that proper legislation, wisely administered, would in some respects be beneficial to all concerned. Therefore I have supported this bill, although at times there has been very little of detail in it which I fully approved. I have about made up my mind that I shall offer few, if any, amendments, though I shall support some that will be offered. As we go through the bill I shall present, as the sections are taken up, my view of the manner in which the legislation could be improved. Having done that I think it is the part of wisdom under existing conditions not to insist upon a vote on many amendments. Because while I realize—and I am very frank in my statement, because the chairman of the committee was—that there are members of the committee who would agree to the wisdom of some of the amendments that might be offered, I also realize that the committee is bound by a very proper agreement to adhere in the main to the bill as it has been reported. I do hope, however, that elsewhere than here, after the House has passed the bill, it will have consideration in a smaller body of men, who can sit down dispassionately, without prejudice, without bias, without being dragged hither and yon by this influence or that, and endeavor to get out of this legislation something that will be workable for the future, and something that will be reasonably fair to the locator and to the developer now upon the oil lands of the country.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In other words, to adopt some of the many amendments which the gentleman will not offer.

Mr. MONDELL. Or, to put it a little more correctly, to adopt some of the suggestions which I shall make from time to time as we reach the various sections of the bill. The western operators—that is, those who represented more especially the smaller locators, oil companies, and associations—agreed upon a series of amendments which they presented to the committee. I believe that practically all of those amendments were wise. Quite a number of them have been adopted in a more or less modified form and appear in this bill. I believe they all ought finally, possibly in somewhat modified form, be adopted and made a part of the legislation as it shall be crystallized in the law.

It is a very unfortunate thing that this tremendously important matter of oil and coal leasing should from the very beginning have been colored and clouded and affected by the fact that there were a few very large interests in tremendous straits and in real jeopardy, men who had gone on, as far as I know, in perfect good faith and spent their money and made large and tremendously useful and helpful developments and whose investments and earnings and gains were in very great jeopardy.

This is tremendously important legislation outside of the question of the rights of a few large operators. And yet, curiously enough, the main general features of the bill have been comparatively little discussed. I believe that on the floor of the House I have discussed them more than all others combined. I think I have presented them before the committee more fully than they have been presented by anyone else, perhaps by all others. I have done that because I have had some experience with coal and oil development, and my State contains vast areas of valuable coal and oil lands. It contains vast areas of land that we believe will prove to be valuable for oil and very considerable areas whose oil values have already been developed. It is tremendously important that this law as it affects the men who shall take advantage of it in the future shall be a reasonably workable law. It is even more important that it recognize and fairly protect present claimants and locators.

I have been particularly interested for and on behalf of the small oil locator and operator, the ordinary citizen who has gone out on the public domain as a wildcatter, using what information he had with regard to the geological structures, making the best guess he could, as prospectors always have from the beginning of oil development, setting his stake, sinking his prospect hole, doing his assessment work, and then seeking for capital to develop his property.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a fact that under the placer-mining law anyone has to be a citizen of the United States before he can locate, and the question about big locators or corporations can only take place after the locator has made his location and sold to some one else?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know about all the oil locations that have been made, of course; but, so far as I know, the locations made under the placer act have, in the main, been made by men of moderate or limited means.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a further fact that in practically all the placer locations of oil land, leaving out minerals, gold, and so forth, they have reaped the benefits of their sales to those who assisted them in the development of the oil claim in the way of drilling holes, and so forth?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman's question is, Have they received the benefits?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. In some cases they have and in some cases no one has received any benefit, for there is no greater game of chance known among men under heaven than that of oil drilling. It is an extraordinary thing that money can be found for oil development on the merest suspicion that oil may be found, and frequently in cases where men who ought to know have repeatedly declared that oil never will be found. But it appeals to the citizen who likes to take a chance, and so men of limited means have gone on in making their locations; they have been enabled in many cases to secure capital for the development, and while in many cases no paying development has followed, in many other cases oil has been found and fields developed where geologists have said there was not the slightest hope of such development.

Mr. RAKER. As a matter of fact, from the testimony in the hearings all these fields have been discovered by men on the ground drilling the well without geological information.

Mr. MONDELL. I am glad the gentleman asked me that question, because there is so much misinformation in the public mind relative to the so-called withdrawals. Some people are of the opinion that the Government has sent out large numbers of men learned in geology, competent to locate oil fields, and that they have so located them and that then the Government has withdrawn the land. I know of no case where any lands have been withdrawn until the wildcatter, the local locator, had set his stakes, began development, and had evidenced his determination to try it out. Generally the withdrawal order has not issued until somewhere on such an area some fellow, more lucky than his neighbors, has been able to make a discovery, whereupon the withdrawal order covered all the territory.

Now, if these lands were copper lands, if they were gold lands, if they contained any other mineral than oil, the merest suspicion of discovery would fix the right of the locator so that no withdrawal could affect him. But owing to the rulings and decisions as to what constitutes an oil discovery, unless the locator has sunk his well deep enough to get oil in very considerable and unquestioned quantities, his right is likely to be challenged, and therefore the withdrawal order operates as an adverse right or claim, depriving him under the rulings of the department of any right in the premises.

In my State and surrounding States the locations have progressed all the way from the driving of the first stake to the setting up of the rig and the expenditure of very great sums of money in the effort to find oil.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming five minutes more.

Mr. MONDELL. But in every case where there has not been an unquestioned and unchallenged discovery the withdrawal operates as an adverse right, and the claimant is likely to lose all of his time, all of his labor, and all of his investment. That is the situation affecting hundreds and thousands of locators, claimants, and investors whom we have sought to protect in this legislation. I regret to say that while the committee has inserted provisions in the bill that will afford some relief and be of some value, there is no provision in the bill which gives full protection and relief, either to the ordinary locator, claimant, or investor, or to the large interests who have made extensive development. It is my hope that this will be remedied before the bill is crystallized into law.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman is familiar with the subject, and has been for the last 15 or 20 years, and I want to ask if it is not a fact that while there have been some instances of considerable valuable property taken out in a number of locations, yet the actual money expended in the development and prospecting for oil in the last 20 years is almost equal to that which has been produced?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think there is anyone who is competent to answer that question. That is a matter of opinion. Offhand, I should say there has been more money invested in oil stocks, spent in one way and another, directly or indirectly, in oil promotion and development, than has been returned by the oil produced. I am not sure that that is not true of all mineral development. It is this fact of that element of chance that has led our people, and that is why our people, anxious to encourage mineral developments so valuable and necessary to the Nation, have always had very liberal laws with regard to them.

We have tried to encourage the men of ambition, the men of energy, the men willing to rough it and take a chance, and so we have opened to them every opportunity. The prizes are rare as the prizes of one of the old-time lotteries, but at times they are greater than any other industrial prizes that can be won by man, and it is because of the fact that here and there was the possibility of a great prize luring men on that thousands and hundreds of thousands of men took their packs on their backs and their lives in their hands and went out into the hills, into the deserts, over trackless wastes and developed the great mines and oil fields, the great reservoirs of mineral wealth that have had so much to do with making us a great and powerful and rich and, in this great war, a useful and helpful Nation. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. RUBEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2896. An act for the relief of Elizabeth Marsh Watkins.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 10069) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. RANSDELL, and Mr. NELSON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 10854) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, had insisted upon its amendments, had asked a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. TILLMAN, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. SMITH of Maryland, Mr. PENROSE, and Mr. LODGE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

OIL AND COAL BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON].

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, in view of the agreement of the committee upon this bill, and the fact that practically no opposition to it is anticipated, and the desire of the committee to put the bill upon its passage as soon as possible, I had not expected to say anything upon it. There were no controverted questions that were expected to be brought on the floor of the House. There were a great many in the committee. Those matters have been settled by compromise and agreement, and they have been settled, as the chairman said, in such a way as to receive the acquiescence of the oil men of Wyoming and California, but not with the conviction on their part that absolute justice and equity have been accorded them.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELSTON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I think it can scarcely be said that the oil men of my State at least have acquiesced in the action of the committee in the relief measures. I think quite the opposite is true.

Mr. ELSTON. If the gentleman will permit me, I shall amend that by substituting the word "suffered."

Mr. MONDELL. I think they have suffered.

Mr. ELSTON. They have suffered this situation to develop as it has. They found that a deadlock would occur if they had persisted, and if a large majority of the committee had adhered to what they believed was the justice of the oil men's contention, a situation would have developed that probably would have barred any legislation at all. This bill contains a good deal more subject matter than that of relief to the oil operators of the West. The great scope of it covers a new theory in the leasing of public lands, in so far as the mineral content of them is concerned, and that is a tremendous subject. It is a subject of great importance, which has appealed to all of the conservationists of the land. It would be a tremendous disappointment to them if this bill now so favorably upon its passage should be stayed in any way by the delay in settling questions of justice to the California and Wyoming oil men. Realizing that, and submerging their own matters to the general good, the oil men have, as I say, submitted to superior considerations, and I believe that there will be no opposition on the floor to the passage of this bill. It is perfectly obvious, however, that adequate justice has not been done to the oil operators of the West. In a way the unfortunate situation in which they found themselves when the initial withdrawal order of 1909 was made was practically the fault of the United States Government in not providing an adequate law under which oil locations could be made.

For 50 years there has been either by custom or by legislative enactment a means by which locations could be made by those who discovered gold either upon the surface loose in the gravel or in the solid rock itself. When oil was discovered about 25 years ago the only analogy that the prospector could go by to locate his claim was the placer-mining law, with which he was familiar. For many years such locations were made under the placer-mining law, but it was not till 1897 that Congress passed an act expressly sanctioning such procedure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield five minutes additional time to the gentleman.

Mr. ELSTON. It practically validated a custom under which he had operated, so far as oil locations were concerned, for many years theretofore. Now, he was pursuing that legal method of location in 1909, when the first withdrawal was made, and he found himself in a situation largely due to the inadequacy of the placer-mining law as applied to oil locations. It was not the result of a conspiracy; it was not the result of any malignant act; it was the result of an honest effort to prospect for oil and locate oil claims under an act that did not fit the case. Twice this House has passed legislation that gave them a measure of relief. In effect, upon relinquishment to the Government of their asserted title, it gave them the whole of their claims, not exceeding 640 acres, upon a royalty of one-eighth of the oil produced.

Now comes this bill abating the relief accorded to them twice by unanimous vote of the House, and restricts them to the producing wells upon their claims. The oil men still contend that this is not all they should have. It may be all they can get in view of the legislative situation and in view of the attitude of the departments. It is not what we ought to have. We are impelled to it by the tremendous menace to our industries in California by reason of delay in getting some kind of action, however unsatisfactory it may be. In California at the present time there is a deficit of 38,000 barrels of oil per day. The stocks which have accumulated for many years previous are now practically depleted. The great Southern Pacific Railway and other railway systems have only 10 days' supply ahead. The coast newspapers have been warned by the Oil Administrator that in all likelihood their supply of fuel oil must stop unless there be a larger production soon. A great calamity to all Pacific-coast industries impends, and can only be averted by the immediate opening of new wells. The withdrawn areas offer the only field for such new production. Naval reserve No. 2, in which there are many private holdings, must contribute its share. In fact it represents the only certain source of relief. The situation was such, therefore, that upon the faith of assurances given by the departments that added production would come under this relief section we suffered this relief legislation to go through the committee without opposing it. But we hold the departments to the implied promises and the encouraging assurances given to us. By virtue of the large relief powers herein given to the President, and under the wide discretion granted to him to permit larger production, we confidently expect considerate treatment of the California oil industry, upon which depends the industrial life of the Pacific coast. [Applause.]

Mr. FERRIS. As I understand, there will be no more speeches over on that side. There will only be one over on this side, and I yield the remainder of my time, or such part as he may desire, to the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. SULZER].

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the conditions existing in Alaska have been given consideration in this bill, and the Territory has been treated with liberality such as will, we hope, bring about a local production of oil for the needs of the Territory, and possibly add to the supplies for the States. The potential fuel resources of the Territory are great, but nothing can be said in this connection definitely or with accuracy regarding any particular claim until the pioneer work of exploration and development is done, or until, by the actual production and marketing of coal and oil, the geological conditions, the costs of operation, transportation, and markets are determined. All the numerous factors which enter into the production of fuel in Alaska must be determined by actual mining experience, and, unfortunately, up to this time this has been of a very limited nature. In addition, it must be considered that Alaska still remains largely a virgin land, in the far North, where it is necessary that every inducement be offered to encourage development, not only because many unknown factors and uncertainties involve a greater risk, but also because the physical conditions under which operations must be conducted are, in most instances, greater than in the States. These facts were carefully considered by the committee and the terms of the bill were made more liberal, as applied to Alaska, in order to induce immediate development and thus provide a supply of oil for the very urgent local needs that exist in Alaska at this time.

The raw materials produced in Alaska are of vital necessity to the Government in the prosecution of the war, and in order to present to you concisely how valuable a rôle Alaska is playing in the activities of the country at this time I will read the list of products shipped from Alaska during the year 1917, as given in the annual report of the collector of customs, which is as follows:

Value of merchandise and gold and silver shipped from Alaska to United States, 1917.

	Quantity.	Value.
MINERAL PRODUCTS.
Tin ore, pounds	219,894	$114,462
Tungsten ore, pounds	20,160	19,550

This year Alaska is adding another most valuable product to her list of war supplies, producing millions of feet of the very finest aeroplane spruce lumber that can be found anywhere.

FROM TIN TO TURNIPS.

From tin to turnips, these products are of great essential value and most of them are vital requirements in the prosecution of the war. Doubtless many will be surprised to know that Alaska numbers turnips among her exports, yet the truth is that Alaska contains wonderful agricultural possibilities. Thousands of tons of potatoes and other vegetables were raised and consumed in the Territory last year, and wheat is grown and matured successfully, giving a yield of more than 50 bushels per acre. Also it probably is not widely known that Alaska produces the only commercial tin on the continent, and that antimony, tungsten, and many other of the rarer metals are widely distributed throughout the Territory. While many of these developments are in their infancy, and while production is small, they are nevertheless very important.

It is in copper and gold and fish that Alaska is making its big contribution at this time. During the year 1917 Alaska produced 300,000,000 cans of salmon, a considerable portion not being shipped out until 1918. Think of it! If these cans were placed end to end they would encircle the globe at the equator, with several thousand miles to spare. You are all familiar with Pennsylvania Avenue, and if the Alaska salmon pack for 1917 were stacked up on Pennsylvania Avenue it would fill that broad thoroughfare from the Peace Monument to the Treasury, from curb to curb, to a depth of 4 feet. It would make a compact mass of salmon 1 mile long, 150 feet wide, and 4 feet thick. Or—another illustration of the magnitude of the salmon yield of Alaska—if loaded in freight cars, with every car filled to capacity, it would require a train of 5,000 cars. This enormous supply of food is dependent upon an adequate supply of oil. Without a supply of gasoline and distillate this great food supply would come to an end. This bill, if it becomes a law, will assure an adequate supply of oil for this industry.

Some people still imagine Alaska is only a land of ice and snow, with some fabulous gold mines to add a touch of romance. This is a mistake. The romance is largely a thing of the past, recorded in story books and the motion pictures made on the sun-kissed shores of California. Alaska is in the same latitudes as Scotland, Norway, Sweden, and Finland. Our principal cities are no farther north than Edinburgh, Copenhagen, Christiania, Stockholm, or Petrograd. Those countries and cities of northern Europe contain millions of people following all the various pursuits of modern life, and all are prosperous. You do not think it strange that they should have large agricultural and industrial development. Why, then, should not the same thing be true regarding our own great Territory of Alaska? There is no reason; and the actually demonstrated fact is that the natural conditions in Alaska are just as favorable as the natural conditions in the countries of northern Europe. The real fact is that in some respects the natural conditions in Alaska are far more favorable than in the European countries of the same latitudes. The Japanese current has a most temperate action on all the southern coast of Alaska for thousands of miles.

Having resided in Alaska for 15 years, and having spent 15 winters within the Territory, I was somewhat surprised to find it colder in this capital city of Washington during the past winter than I had ever experienced in Alaska. Of course that is not true of all Alaska. There are sections there where the thermometer at rare intervals registers 80° below zero, and the greater part of Alaska experiences very cold winters; but you must not forget that Alaska is a big country; that its range of latitude is as great as that from Key West to the northernmost point of Maine. If you superimpose a map of Alaska on a map of the United States of the same scale, you will find it will touch both oceans and the Canadian and Mexican borders.

Alaska has a coast line of 26,000 miles, and this enormous coast is one gigantic fishery, yielding a greater quantity of sea products than all the remainder of the Pacific Ocean. These great fisheries are practically all absolutely dependent upon the modern motor-power vessel, and the fishing fleet of Alaska is developed to the highest point of efficiency in all respects. Therefore practically every fish caught in Alaskan waters in the commercial fisheries is contingent upon an adequate supply of oil.

Our great gold dredges and mining mills and our transportation facilities are very largely dependent upon a supply of oil. All industrial and commercial life to-day is dependent upon fuel. This is the age of machinery, and machinery is powerless without fuel.

Heretofore we have been unable to develop and use the great potential fuel resources of Alaska. They are lying dormant, as they have lain for thousands of years, and in that condition they are of no value to anyone. We have been forced to import our oil from California and our coal supplies from British Columbia, Washington, Wyoming, and even from Japan and Australia. Millions of tons of coal and millions of gallons of oil have been shipped to Alaska, whereas every economic reason requires that the reverse should be the case.

The following tables give the quantities of coal and oil shipped to Alaska during the past several years:

COAL.

Coal consumed in Alaska, 1899 to 1916 (in short tons).

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman being on the committee and having given such careful and diligent attention to the proceedings before the committee, not only to the general leasing bill, but particularly to Alaska as relating to the coal lands and oil lands in that Territory, and particularly the repealing clause, I want to ask the gentleman if the language of the bill as reported by the committee is not, in his mind, such that it will give to Alaska some real relief?

Mr. SULZER. I think it will, undoubtedly. At the present time we have absolutely no oil development in that Territory and can not have any, because the entire Territory, a matter of some 600,000 square miles, has been withdrawn so far as any of it may contain oil.

Mr. RAKER. I remember the gentleman's particularly deep interest in the matter before the committee in regard to the Alaskan feature so far as it relates to the oil. The gentleman feels now that those provisions he succeeded in getting into the bill will practically relieve the Alaskan situation?

Mr. SULZER. I think so, and I certainly hope so.

Mr. Chairman, practically all the coal and oil used in Alaska is shipped from great distances, and the charges are very heavy, and this condition creates a prohibitive cost for all ordinary operations and confines development to the richer resources, known as bonanzas. Only the very rich placer-gold ground, the very rich and favorably located copper and rarer metals deposits, and the richer portions of the great fisheries can be worked under the present excessive costs of fuel. It is not only a question of high costs, but the impossibility of obtaining imports of fuel, in many cases, under any circumstances. The oil situation in California is becoming acute, and any day may bring about a suspension of shipments to Alaska and thereby end the great production of our fisheries, so essential in sustaining our land and naval forces and those of our allies.

Without cheap fuel no great development can take place anywhere, even in a tropical country, much less in Alaska. Fuel is the foundation of the business structure to-day, and Alaska has made a wonderful showing, when it is considered that her activities have been carried on for years while her fuel resources have been locked up. This is one of the greatest difficulties under which Alaska has been struggling, and this difficulty accounts largely for the fact that there are to-day less than 50,000 white people in Alaska, after it has been under the American flag for more than 50 years. There should be hundreds of thousands of people in Alaska, and with adequate development of our fuel resources we would have them.

The known oil fields of Alaska are described by Maj. Alfred H. Brooks, formerly chief of the Alaska division of the United States Geological Survey, in Bulletin 666P. Maj. Brooks, undoubtedly, has a more intimate knowledge of Alaskan geology and geography than any other person. The study of Alaska has been his life work and we have come to call him our own, and consider as one of Alaska's important contributions to the successful prosecution of the war the able services of Maj. Brooks as a member of the staff of Gen. Pershing in France.

On page 13 of the bulletin which I have mentioned, Maj. Brooks speaks of the Alaska oil fields as follows:

Petroleum has been found in four districts along the Alaska seaboard. These are the Yakataga field, which is comparatively inaccessible on account of the lack of a harbor; the Katalla field, which is the only one that is producing oil and which can be made tributary to Controller Bay without great expense for construction and without great loss of time, or can be reached by an easily constructed 60-mile branch from the Copper River Railroad; the Iniskin Bay field, on Cook Inlet; and the Cold Bay field, on the Alaska Peninsula. The last two are tributary to harbors that are free from ice throughout the year.

Drilling has not been sufficient in the partly developed field at Katalla to determine the presence of any considerable pools. The rather wide distribution of seepage and the results of the drilling of some 25 holes indicate that oil might be obtained in this field in a larger quantity than that now yielded by the five or six wells that are being pumped. The petroleum from this field, like that from other Alaska fields, is a high-grade refining oil with a paraffin base. As oil of this grade is in great demand for the manufacture of gasoline, and as the supply under war conditions may not meet the needs, every encouragement should be given to those who are willing to spend the money necessary for the drilling. Unless a large pool is struck early in operations, which is not believed probable, it will take at least a year to drill a sufficient number of holes to assure any considerable production. This statement is based on the records of the existing wells. The producing wells are shallow and the oil has to be pumped. To meet the present emergency it will probably be best to drill a large number of shallow wells rather than to attempt to test the ultimate possibilities of the field by sinking deep holes. The above statement of conditions and possibilities in the Katalla field probably holds, in general, for the Iniskin and Cold Bay fields. In these fields, however, there has been very little drilling and no production. The geologic structure of these fields, so far as known, is simpler than that of the Katalla field, and it is therefore easier to direct operators to the most probable locations of possible pools.

The Alaska oil lands were withdrawn from entry in 1910. A small area of oil land has been patented in the Katalla field, and other claims are still pending. If the Alaska oil fields are to be regarded as a possible source for refining oil during the present emergency, immediate action should be taken by which operators can obtain freehold or leasehold titles to sufficient areas to justify the large expenditures necessary for drilling.

The history of Alaskan oil development began with some prospecting in 1898, and the first wells were drilled in 1902-3. From that time until 1910 a large sum, in the aggregate, perhaps, upward of a million dollars, was spent in oil development. Most of the money was necessarily spent in preliminary work, such as docks, houses, roads, sawmills, and so forth. A number of wells were drilled by different companies, but unfortunately no large pools were found. Of course, there were some wells which were dry. All that time there was no local market, or practically none. To operate successfully without a local market oil must be produced in sufficient quantity to ship in cargo lots of 5,000 to 10,000 barrels. The wells in which oil was found only produce 5 to 10 barrels a day, and this was too small to make up a cargo. As a result the companies got into financial difficulties.

Then in 1910, without any notice or warning, came the following order of withdrawal:

WITHDRAWAL ORDER OF NOVEMBER 3, 1910.
(Petroleum reserve No. 12—Alaska No. 1.)

NOVEMBER 3, 1910.

It is hereby ordered that all the public lands and lands in national forests in the District of Alaska containing petroleum deposits be, and the same are hereby, withdrawn from settlement, location, sale, or entry, and reserved for classification and in aid of legislation affecting the use and disposal of petroleum lands belonging to the United States.

WILLIAM H. TAFT, President.

Referred to the Commissioner of the General Land Office for appropriate action.

R. A. BALLINGER, Secretary.

There was no opportunity for debate or discussion or chance to be heard as to the justice or wisdom of the policy of withdrawal. Moreover, while withdrawals generally related to specific areas, which were described in the order, the Alaska withdrawal was much more sweeping. In fact it withdrew all the oil lands of the territory, known and unknown. It simply abrogated the law on the subject as completely as if it had been repealed by act of Congress.

To be sure the withdrawal order purported to reserve the rights of those who had valid and existing claims, but what was a valid and existing claim was so strictly construed that few, if any, of the claimants could be sure of their title. Only one claim, comprising 140 acres, in the whole territory had been patented. Perhaps a hundred or more had been located, but after the withdrawal order most of them were abandoned or allowed to lapse. A few men who had spent large sums of money and owned buildings and much valuable property and equipment held on, hoping year after year that the question of title would be cleared up and that they would then be able to find fresh capital and renew their development work. Most of the original owners have long since dropped out. Many of them are dead, and most of them were bankrupted by their efforts to develop this new country. The natural difficulties have been great, but the legal difficulties have been far greater.

Thus nearly 20 years of effort to develop the Alaska oil fields has come to almost nothing, for there are only five or six wells in operation, producing 25 or 30 barrels of oil per day. It is significant that every producing well is upon the one patented claim. During these 20 years the Alaska market has been growing. The industries, such as fishing and mining, must have fuel, and as practically no oil or coal could be gotten from its own land Alaska has been obliged to import practically all the oil and coal it used.

This withdrawal order put an end to all oil development within the 600,000 square miles of land comprising the Territory of Alaska, and for eight long years the people of Alaska have been patiently waiting for legislation that would give them an opportunity to use the fuel at their doors instead of importing their requirements from points thousands of miles distant.

The fuel resources of Alaska were locked up in the name of conservation, and the people of the United States were led to believe that the resources of Alaska must be reserved for future requirements. No theory was ever more fallacious or harmful. It is not conservation to haul coal from the Atlantic coast to the Pacific coast, and consumes a third of it in the haul, when all the needs can be met by opening the deposits on the Pacific coast. It is not conservation to haul oil from California to Alaska when a local supply can be developed in Alaska. Such a policy is the very antithesis of conservation; it is shameful waste. Fuel must be used to keep the wheels of commerce revolving, and it matters not where it may come from, the general supplies are reduced that much, but the nearer the fuel can be produced to the point where it is to be consumed the less waste there will be in needless transportation.

Some good people are periodically worried by a fear that the resources of the country will become exhausted, and that the Nation thereby will come to grief. This has been true from the beginning. Some good people were greatly worried about the exhaustion of oil when the world was entirely dependent for its artificial light upon the oil derived from the sperm whale. The sperm whale still exists, but we have long since passed to a better lighting system. Human enterprise and inventive genius have not yet ceased to exist in the world, and new discoveries will be made in the future as in the past. There is no danger of the exhaustion of the oil supplies in this country, and in this connection I wish to read some extracts from an article in the National Geographic Magazine for the month of February, 1918, by Guy Elliott Mitchell, of the United States Geological Survey, in regard to the future prospects in oil production. On page 197 Mr. Mitchell says:

The total production of petroleum in the United States up to 1918 has been 4,255,000,000 barrels, and the possible future production, or the total reserve in the ground—and some of it lies very deep—is estimated by the Federal Government at about 7,000,000,000 barrels.

How does this petroleum compare with the known oil-shale reserve? The quantity of oil that can be extracted from the shale is so huge that the petroleum reserve becomes almost insignificant by comparison. As a result of only a partial investigation it is estimated that the oil in the shale ranges of Colorado alone amount to 20,000,000,000 barrels. There are our mountains—indeed, ranges of mountains—which for many miles carry thick beds of rock that yield 30 to 50 barrels of oil to the ton.

More recently the State geologist of Colorado has reported that in northwestern Colorado beds of commercially workable rock that average more than 20 feet in thickness and that will yield at least 36 gallons of oil to the ton are found in an area extending over 1,500 square miles. These figures show a content of 24,000,000 barrels of oil to the square mile, or a total of 36,000,000,000 barrels for the area. Either 20,000,000,000 or 36,000,000,000 is sufficiently impressive.

The potential value of this immense oil resource of America is almost beyond comprehension. Enough oil is held in these natural reservoirs to fill many times over every tank, cask, barrel, can, and other container of every kind in the world.

The discovery of these vast deposits of oil-bearing rock in the United States, the petroleum contents of which can be estimated in nothing less than hundreds of billions of barrels, is one more evidence of the abounding wealth of the North American Continent. No sooner does one of our resources show limitations in production and the pessimists begin to cry, "What shall we do when our reserve is gone?" than immense additional deposits of satisfactory substitutes are discovered.

During the last few years petroleum, with its most valuable constituent—gasoline—has become one of our most vital resources, so that even the most cheerful optimists might well begin to question the immediate future prospect of the industry; but with thousands of square miles of rock lying above ground, within sight of trunk-line railroads and constituting an unfailing oil reservoir, we can feel assured of a supply of gasoline for many generations to come.

The United States is indeed a country blessed by a generous Providence. Germany, to supplement its stock of petroleum and gasoline, laboriously raises potatoes, from which to distill fuel alcohol; but here in America there are mountains of oil rock which can be blasted and steam shoveled and transported by gravity to great retorts which will turn out oil and fertilizer in limitless quantities.

The production of oil in this country, instead of decreasing, will continue to grow; it will even, because of the shale resource, greatly increase its present immense output of 340,000,000 barrels a year and will keep pace with the enormously increasing demand. No one may be bold enough to foretell what tremendous figure of production may be reached within the next 10 years.

The need for gasoline and distillate in Alaska is immediate and very urgent, and this emergency can probably best be met by the owners of some 60 claims that were located prior to the withdrawal of 1910. With assurance that their investments are reasonably protected, they are prepared to make the expenditures necessary to obtain an immediate supply of oil. These claimants are entitled to consideration; they have been the pioneers and trail blazers in a new field, and their risks and difficulties have been great. These claimants have in good faith held their claims for years and complied with the law. They have been awaiting legislation that would define their status and enable them to proceed. There are no contests in Alaska, and all concerned are agreed that speedy development of the Alaskan oil fields should be encouraged by liberal treatment.

Mr. Chairman, Alaskans have been groping in a twilight zone of uncertainty for years in regard to the development of the resources of the Territory in so far as the attitude of the Government was concerned.

The progress that should have been made has not been made. The population has decreased rather than increased, and the trouble lies in too severe requirements imposed upon the settlement and development of the public domain. This bill provides a step in the right direction, and I hope it will speedily become law and be followed by other liberal laws that will draw people and capital to Alaska to settle and develop this vast area, so that it may be not only a stupendous wilderness of magnificent scenery, but also a land filled with farms and mills, happy homes, and thriving cities. Only by such development can Alaska be the great asset to America that she should be and that Alaskans of all people are most anxious to make her become. While Alaskans have struggled with many uncertainties and numerous changes in governmental policy in the treatment of the public domain in the North, there has been no twilight zone of patriotism in Alaska. No people anywhere under our flag stand more squarely behind President Wilson in the vigorous prosecution of the war for the defense of American honor and integrity and the safety of democratic government against the ruthless iron heel of military despotism. No Americans anywhere are more loyal and patriotic or more enthusiastically and whole-heartedly determined to make any sacrifice to win the war. Alaskans will be found well represented in every branch of the Army and Navy, and before the draft law went into effect in Alaska the Territory had sent many more volunteers than her quota under the draft. There can be no better soldiers than the men of Alaska, who love adventure and become accustomed to facing dangers and hardships in their everyday life.

Alaskans have assisted in every possible way in all the war activities of the Government. No State in the Union has contributed more liberally, per capita, to the Red Cross, the liberty loans, the war-savings stamp, and other patriotic war organizations than has Alaska. From Ketchikan to Nome, Alaska communities were ready to subscribe their full liberty-loan quotas on the first day of the campaign, and they kept adding to those subscriptions daily until the last day, when it was found that most of them had gone over the top several times. An indication of the spirit with which Alaskans are trying to do more than their share to down the enemy is shown by the following telegram:

FAIRBANKS, ALASKA, May 7, 1918.

CHARLES A. SULZER,
Delegate from Alaska, Washington, D. C.:

Fairbanks and vicinity subscribed to third liberty loan $425,000, being over five times quota. This does not include $25,000 subscribed by Nenana. Boy Scouts helped to extent of over $69,000, also going over top five times.

FAIRBANKS COMMERCIAL CLUB.

Over 80 per cent of Alaskans are members of the Red Cross, and the noble women and children of the North, as well as the men, are doing their full share of the splendid service toward winning the war.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a Territory so remote and so sparsely settled that has gone to such limits in contributing to the Nation in this hour of need, a Territory that has given so freely of its men, money, labor, metals, and food, is well worthy of consideration. All this bill does is to give Alaskans a chance to obtain a local supply of oil under fair and reasonable conditions. This is not asking too much and should be granted without question. Alaska occupies a most important position in the Pacific and is destined to play an important part in world affairs of the future. Its value can be made very great and a source of great strength to the Nation. At the present time, Alaska's vast extent and limited population are sources of weakness. We must be permitted to grow and develop with more freedom and fewer restrictions. We must be permitted to use our resources more freely and thus create a greater and ever greater volume of trade with the States. Alaska's value to the Nation consists in the raw materials she can produce and send through the numerous industrial and commercial arteries of our national life and of the manufactured and finished articles she can purchase from the several States.

The trade of Alaska, per capita, is the greatest in the world, and, given the use of local fuel, more liberal governmental regulations, and broader powers of self-government, Alaska will be an unfailing source of wealth and strength to the Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, let the Clerk read the first paragraph of the bill, and then I will move to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. We are now considering the Senate bill.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to consider the substitute in lieu of Senate bill 2812, so that the first section, to all intents and purposes, will be the language in italics on page 28, beginning with line 7.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I will.

Mr. RAKER. Consider the House amendment as though it were an original bill?

Mr. FERRIS. That is the request I make.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the House bill be substituted for the Senate bill 2812. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That deposits of coal, phosphate, oil or gas, owned by the United States, including those in national forests, the Grand Canyon National Monument, and the Mount Olympus National Monument, but excluding those in national parks, and in lands withdrawn or reserved for military or naval uses or purposes, except as hereinafter provided, shall be subject to disposition in the form and manner provided by this act to citizens of the United States, or to any association of such persons, or to any corporation organized under the laws of the United States, or of any State or Territory thereof, and in the case of coal, oil, or gas, to municipalities.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise, leaving the paragraph open for any amendment that may be offered to-morrow.

The motion to rise was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DEWALT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 2812) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 24, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting supplemental estimate of appropriations required by the Engineer Department of the Army for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1124); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting additional estimates of appropriations required by the Engineer Department of the Army for the fiscal years 1918 and 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1125); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Little Tennessee River, Tenn. (H. Doc. No. 1126); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. SEARS, from the Committee on Education, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12212) to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 597), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 3797. An act validating certain applications for and entries of public lands, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Lands; and

S. 3923. An act authorizing the Indian tribes and individual Indians, or any of them, residing in the State of Washington and west of the summit of the Cascade Mountains, to submit to the Court of Claims certain claims growing out of treaties and otherwise; to the Committee on Claims.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CRISP: A bill (H. R. 12246) to subject Federal, State, and municipal officers to income and war excess-profits tax; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. NORTON: A bill (H. R. 12247) to provide for incorporating the Supreme Lodge of Knights of Modern Syria; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BOOHER: A bill (H. R. 12248) granting an increase of pension to William B. Talbott; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma: A bill (H. R. 12249) for the relief of Jacob B. Moore; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. DAVIS: A bill (H. R. 12250) to reimburse Horace A. Chouinard, chaplain in the Twenty-third Infantry, for loss of certain personal property; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. LOBECK: A bill (H. R. 12251) granting a pension to Katherine McArthur; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MOORES of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 12252) granting a pension to Elizabeth J. Montague; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHOUSE: A bill (H. R. 12253) granting an increase of pension to J. Wesley Barr; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SIMS: A bill (H. R. 12254) granting an increase of pension to John B. Hays; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SWEET: A bill (H. R. 12255) granting an increase of pension to John D. Sullivan; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12256) granting an increase of pension to Jabez B. Jennings; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SNYDER: A bill (H. R. 12257) granting a pension to Hannah R. Grant; to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Memorial of the Billy Sunday Tabernacle workers and of the New Jersey conference, Epworth League, protesting against the action of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia in allowing Sunday baseball; also, a memorial of the Presbyterian Ministers' Association of Washington City and vicinity, making a similar protest, and asking for the passage of a Sunday rest-day bill; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, memorial of H. L. Post No. 750, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Ohio, urging the passage of the Smoot pension bill for the relief of Civil War veterans; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CARY: Petition of the Allied Printing Trades Council of Milwaukee, Wis., asking for the repeal of the zone-system features of the war-revenue act; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin: Petition of residents of Fontana and Walworth, Wis., asking for the repeal of the zone system for carrying second-class mail; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. DEWALT: Resolutions of the Lehigh Valley Motor Club, of Allentown, Pa., Mr. H. I. Koch, secretary, urging the adoption of a program that will assure adequate highway construction and maintenance; also, the creation of a centralized Federal authority to determine the highway policy of our Government, with power to direct the administration of that policy; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, resolutions adopted by the International Union of the United Brewery Workmen, Local Union No. 264, Allentown, Pa., protesting against the second-class postage provisions of the war-revenue bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: Memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America, for universal military training; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of sundry citizens of Minooka, Ill., for the repeal of the zone system for second-class mail; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. GALLIVAN: Memorial of the West Roxbury (Mass.) Woman's Club and of the Young Men Christian Association Forum, Lynn, Mass., protesting against the zone system and the increased rates of postage for periodicals; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania: Petition of the Women's Missionary Society of Crafton, Pa., requesting immediate prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LONERGAN: Resolution of the Connecticut State Council of Defense, in favor of raising the draft age to 45 years; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Resolution of the Common Council of Philadelphia, Pa., opposing the use of the German language; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. OSBORNE: Memorial of the California Loyal League, Los Angeles, Cal., urging Congress to take such action as may be necessary to prevent any and all persons disloyal to our country from operating any restaurant, cafeteria, lunch counter, or boarding house that is open to the public, or any but loyal help be allowed to be employed as proprietor, manager, cook, or waiter; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PRATT: Petition of the officials of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Trumansburg, N. Y., in favor of national war prohibition; also of Sarah M. Witten, Berkshire, N. Y., favoring war-time prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. RAMSEYER: Petition of members of the Willard Street Methodist Episcopal Church, Ottumwa, Iowa, protesting against polygamy; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. STEELE: Petition of residents of Easton, Pa., for the amendment of the Constitution to prevent polygamy in the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. TAGUE: Petition of headquarters, R. A. Pierce Post, No. 190, Grand Army of the Republic, New Bedford, Mass., indorsing Smoot bill, so called; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, petition of the president of the Holyoke Belting Co., Holyoke, Mass., indorsing increased postal rates for publishers, effective July 1, 1918, and condemning postponement of the increase; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of Henry I. Harriman, president of the Chamber of Commerce, Boston, Mass., advocating the retention of the pneumatic-tube service by the conferees on the Post Office appropriation bill; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, telegrams from Ed Flash, jr., vice president of the New York Produce Exchange, and from Alfred E. Marling, president of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, indorsing the amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill by Senator Calder providing for new rates on first-class mail in New York City; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. WOODYARD: Petition of Local Union No. 350, Journeyman Tailors' Union of America, of Parkersburg, W. Va., favoring the enactment of the Smith-Sears rehabilitation bill; to the Committee on Education.

Also, petition of No. 249, Huntington Lodge, International Brotherhood of Boiler Makers, Iron-Ship Builders, and Helpers of America, asking for the repeal of the recently enacted zone postal law; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 24, 1918.

(Legislative day of Thursday, May 23, 1918.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to report the necessary absence of the members of the Committee on Military Affairs, which committee is in session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Henderson	Nelson	Sterling
Brandegee	Hitchcock	New	Sutherland
Culberson	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Swanson
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Thomas
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Thompson
Dillingham	Kellogg	Page	Tillman
Fernald	Kendrick	Pomerene	Townsend
Fletcher	Kenyon	Ransdell	Trammell
Frelinghuysen	King	Saulsbury	Underwood
Gallinger	Kirby	Shafroth	Vardaman
Gerry	Lenroot	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Gronna	McKellar	Sherman	Warren
Guion	McLean	Shields	Watson
Hale	McNary	Simmons	Weeks
Harding	Martin	Smith, Mich.	Willey

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is necessarily absent on account of illness.

Mr. WARREN. The Committee on Military Affairs are in session and Senators NEW, JOHNSON of California, WEEKS, REED, CHAMBERLAIN, and THOMAS ask that they may be recorded as present. They are on public service.

Mr. KIRBY. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], is absent on official business. I desire also to announce that the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] is detained on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8496) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHERWOOD, Mr. RUSSELL, and Mr. LANGLEY managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9160) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHERWOOD, Mr. RUSSELL, and Mr. LANGLEY managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9612) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHERWOOD, Mr. RUSSELL, and Mr. LANGLEY managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10027) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHERWOOD, Mr. RUSSELL, and Mr. LANGLEY managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10477) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHERWOOD, Mr. RUSSELL, and Mr. LANGLEY managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10830) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHERWOOD, Mr. RUSSELL, and Mr. LANGLEY managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11364) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHERWOOD, Mr. RUSSELL, and Mr. LANGLEY managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11663) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHERWOOD, Mr. RUSSELL, and Mr. LANGLEY managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had passed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 4910. An act to authorize the establishment of a town site on the Fort Hall Indian Reservation, Idaho;

H. R. 5489. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exchange for lands in private ownership lands formerly embraced in the grant to the Oregon & California Railroad Co.; and

H. R. 9715. An act extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Bayou Bartholomew, in Ashley County, Wilmot Township, State of Arkansas.

PETITIONS.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of Bend of the River Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Niles, Mich., praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Kalamazoo, Mich., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

ESTATE OF RUDOLPH H. VON EZDORF, DECEASED.

Mr. GRONNA, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 2474) for the relief of the widow of Rudolph H. von Ezdorf, deceased, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 465) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 4600) authorizing the appointment of Fernando L. Birrer as marine gunner on the retired list of the United States Marine Corps; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. WATSON:

A bill (S. 4601) to correct military record of James McD. Hays; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 4602) granting a pension to Willis Gray Southerland; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 4603) to further protect interstate and foreign commerce against bribery and other corrupt trade practices; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. OVERMAN:

A bill (S. 4604) to fix the salaries of the clerks of the United States district courts and to provide for their office expenses, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT TO DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,000 to aid the Columbia Polytechnic Institute for the Blind in the District of Columbia, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On May 22, 1918:

S. 3911. An act authorizing national banks to subscribe to the American National Red Cross.

On May 23, 1918:

S. 2123. An act to regulate the practice of podiatry in the District of Columbia.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8496) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WALSH. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. WALSH, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. SMOOT conferees on the part of the Senate.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4557) to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I assume that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], who, I understand, is attending a meeting of the Committee on Military Affairs, desires the Senate to continue the consideration of this bill. If that is the case, I am ready to discuss it for a short time longer.

When the Senate took a recess yesterday afternoon I was starting on a discussion of the experience of Canada in taking care of this problem of reconstruction or rehabilitation of disabled soldiers. I had referred to an article prepared by Mr. John L. Riley on the Canadian experience. Mr. Riley has made a very careful study of the Canadian experience, and his conclusions, I find, are to the effect that through divided control there has been some friction in the Canadian experience.

Although, as I said yesterday, Canada has done excellent work and has achieved a great measure of success in her treatment of disabled soldiers, nevertheless, it is apparent, due to a division of responsibility and the existence of two or more official boards or commissions, each one of whom had nothing to do with this work, there is considerable friction and delay.

As I said, this article or report is too long to be read to the Senate, although it is well worth while for any Senator who cares to see it to examine it. I quote this sentence from one of its paragraphs:

> The progress of the educational work especially appears to be due to the devotion and cooperative spirit of those engaged in it rather than to the administrative plan under which it has come about. To an observer it seems as if much energy must be wasted in the scattered attack upon the problem which division of control implies and that a more direct method could be devised which would result in greater accomplishments with less waste of energy.

I expressed the fear yesterday that the bill now pending if enacted into law would bring about something of that same condition in the United States in our effort to solve this very difficult problem of rehabilitation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not seen the report the Senator refers to. I will ask the Senator if in Canada during the surgical and medical treatment of a wounded soldier others are allowed to enter the hospital for the purpose of giving instruction in vocational matters.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I gather from this report that at least two and probably three Canadian governmental agencies are interested in and engaged in this work, one of them strictly military, the department of militia and defense, and then two other departments which are strictly civilian in character, and that they endeavor to cooperate one with the other. Of course, as the Senator knows, the problem of rehabilitation and vocational instruction must of necessity commence in the hospital itself and proceed along with what might be termed the physical cure of the soldier, and it is at that point in the process where the conflict of authority or the confusion in council is found to occur unless one authority has supreme power.

Mr. GALLINGER. The suggestion the Senator makes does not appeal to me very strongly. I have been educated to believe that sick people needed rest and quiet and that while they were being treated and until they reached a certain stage of convalescence they ought not to be disturbed by anybody.

According to the terms of the bill we are considering—and it seems that that is the practice of Canada, from what the Senator says—while treatment is going on and the surgeons are doing their best to heal the man of his infirmity another organization interferes to educate the man vocationally as he is recovering from his wounds. I think there will be conflict of authority, and very serious conflict, because I can hardly believe that while surgeons are treating a wounded man they will want other people to come in to give him instruction in vocational matters. That is my judgment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I agree with the Senator in that respect, although my information gathered in conversation with surgeons and gentlemen who have made a very exhaustive study of this problem is to the effect that at a certain stage in the recovery or convalescence, if we may so call it, of the disabled soldier, at a period long before medical care and surgical care has ceased, prevocational and vocational training commences, so that one treatment gradually blends into and is absorbed by another.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. With reference to the word "prevocational," as we intended it to mean here, it has reference to that training which is given while the patient is still in the hospital, and is meant to carry the meaning that the Senator has in view. But I have had a conference with Dean Russell this morning and with the Surgeon General and the Assistant Secretary of War, and Dr. Russell claims there is quite a conflict of opinion as to what the word does mean. Therefore I have determined, as a result of this conference, to request the Senate to strike out the word "prevocational" in section 6, where it appears three times.

I mention this in the midst of the Senator's discussion that he may understand the difficulty he has in his mind, if the Senate adopts my suggestion, will be overcome.

I might add that I think the measure, with this change, meets the approval of the War Department, the Surgeon General's department, and Dr. Russell. I have a letter from the Secretary of the Navy expressing for the Navy Department approval of the measure with the amendment we made striking the provision from the original bill permitting the discharged soldier and seaman to be placed in service for vocational training.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have no objection to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Georgia, but I do not think that completely cures the situation. My information is somewhat to the contrary of that of the Senator from Georgia with respect to the attitude of the Medical Department of the Army.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield just a moment on that point?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I mentioned yesterday the fact that this bill met with the approval of Gen. Gorgas. I desire to read from the hearings at page 65 with regard to it:

> Mr. SEARS. You have read the bill over, of course, General?
> Gen. GORGAS. Yes.
> Mr. SEARS. And you indorse it, except that you believe it should be more clear in certain points?
> Gen. GORGAS. Yes.
> Mr. DONOVAN. Your position is, General, I understand it, that up to the finality of the discharged man as a soldier, up to that point, there should be no question as to who has charge?
> Gen. GORGAS. Yes.

In other words, the only objection that Gen. Gorgas had to the bill was the possible conflict which the Senator referred to yesterday. As I understand it, that will be obviated by striking out the word "prevocational" here, and with that change it appears to be entirely satisfactory to the Surgeon General of the Army.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. If I may be permitted to reply to the remarks of the Senator from Tennessee, the testimony given by Gen. Gorgas was given some weeks ago. I am not at liberty to quote him and give him as authority in anything that I say, but my information is most distinctly to the contrary, and my information is most recent. It is to the effect that the Medical Department of the Army is of the opinion that no legislation whatsoever is necessary.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to back up what the Senator is saying, and I am at liberty to quote Gen. Gorgas. I have a letter from him written within one hour which I would like to read, if the Senator will permit.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. RANSDELL (reading)—

> WAR DEPARTMENT,
> OFFICE OF THE SURGEON GENERAL,
> Washington, May 24, 1918.
> Hon. JOSEPH E. RANSDELL,
> United States Senate, Washington, D. C.
> DEAR SENATOR RANSDELL: In our conversation this morning concerning the vocational rehabilitation bill, S. 4557, I think it a mistake to enact this bill at this time concerning this matter.
> The Medical Department is already acting upon a law of Congress passed upon this subject, and all these bills cause delay.
> There is ample authority for doing all that is necessary in this field under the law recently passed by Congress by which we are at present acting. I fear that a bill of this kind, which gives another department authority to come into our hospitals in an administrative capacity, would cause friction in administration.
> Very truly, yours,
> W. C. GORGAS,
> Surgeon General United States Army.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator from Louisiana has read that letter.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. When was that letter written?

Mr. RANSDELL. It was written this morning. I saw the Senator from Michigan in the office, and the letter was handed to me while the Senator was there.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I had wondered whether or not the letter was written at that time.

Mr. RANSDELL. It was written while the Senator from Michigan was there.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, it is a fact that the Medical Department, proceeding upon the theory as expressed in the letter which the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] has read——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to say——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will yield to the Senator in a moment; just let me finish the sentence. It is a fact that the Medical Department, proceeding upon the theory expressed in the letter which has just been read by the Senator from Louisiana, has for many months been preparing to meet this emergency. It has already purchased and has in its possession shop machinery for six reconstruction hospitals, bought and paid for, with the teachers engaged, and some in the course of training to become instructors of disabled soldiers. I am not sure that I can remember all of the hospitals, but one is the Walter Reed Hospital; another at Fort McHenry, near Baltimore; another is at Lakewood, N. J.; another is at Fort McPherson, in Georgia—to which post and hospital I referred here yesterday. There is another one, I think, in the neighborhood of Pittsburgh, Pa., but I am not certain, and can not remember now where the sixth hospital is. There is one in California, I think near the city of San Francisco, and it is perhaps a part of the old Army post there. I can not remember the name of that post, but I know there is one there which would be the sixth, if my recollection is accurate.

The question simply comes to this: The Medical Department has organized this service. Of course, it is in its infancy; it has not yet become elaborate, and has not yet extended to the limits to which it must eventually extend. It has purchased machinery of different kinds to put into shops to teach these men vocations; it has engaged the teachers; and it has organized in the Medical Department a division under the control and management of experts in this very line of work, one of whom is Dr. Russell, as I stated yesterday, the dean of the teachers' college of Columbia University, who is here to-day guiding and advising in this very work, and whose commission in that service is now under consideration. He has been here a month.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was late reaching the Chamber this morning, because Dr. Russell, Gen. Gorgas, and the Assistant Secretary of War were in my office in conference with me. Dr. Russell has not accepted a commission, and has no idea of accepting one. He so stated to me; and the statement that I made with reference to Gen. Gorgas was the result of the conference that we have just had.

Mr. PAGE rose.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator from Vermont desire to interrupt me to ask a question?

Mr. PAGE. I desire to say just a word. The Senator from New York was stating what had been accomplished in Canada, and I was reminded that that matter was brought up in the hearings when Mr. Kidner, who was the principal witness from Canada in regard to Canadian affairs, was before us.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I remember the testimony.

Mr. PAGE. The question was asked Mr. Kidner:

> The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask, is that done by the medical branch or the vocational branch?
>
> Mr. KIDNER. That is done by the vocational branch, sir, which has attached to it and detailed to it a special medical officer who works side by side with the vocational officer in summing up the man.
>
> Senator PAGE. Along that line, does that man cease to be under the control of the military and enter upon the civil?
> Mr. KIDNER. It overlaps with us, sir. A man receives his military discharge when his medical treatment has reached finality, except in the case of the insane and the tuberculous, who are discharged to the civilian commission for further treatment. But a man receives his military discharge in the ordinary case when his medical treatment has reached finality, but the vocational officer is in charge of him for his vocational training from the moment he arrives at the hospital in Canada.
> Senator PAGE. Is there any conflict of authority or any conflict of practice growing out of this dual condition?
> Mr. KIDNER. We have not found it so, sir; and in proof of that I may say that under a recent rearrangement of our hospital administration it is definitely laid down that the vocational training of the disabled men while in military hospitals is still in the hands of the civilian body which is charged with that duty.

That testimony seems to me to indicate that there was no conflict there.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the testimony of one man, and of course another man says there has been some conflict; but he did not appear before our committee. But let me call the Senator's attention to this fact: The very use by that witness of the word "overlapping" is, to my mind, illustrative of an undesirable state of affairs. There should not be any overlapping between two authorities; this matter should be under one authority from the beginning to the end.

Let me say to the Senator that, according to that testimony, in Canada there has been a recent change in the endeavor to perfect this very system of administration, and that witness stated that at the conclusion of the medical treatment the vocational authority then took charge of the soldier.

Mr. PAGE. Yes; but that meanwhile——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me continue. In our service it is not contemplated that medical treatment shall cease and that the soldier shall be turned over as a soldier to vocational treatment. It is contemplated by the Medical Department of the Army that when they shall have cured a man of his disabilities, it shall include restoring him as nearly as possible to that degree of physical and mental and industrial efficiency that he possessed before he went into the Army. The word "cured," as it is construed by our Medical Department, includes a great deal more than merely curing the soldier's wounds; he must be restored as nearly as possible to that degree of efficiency which he possessed before he went into the service; and it is not the purpose of the War Department or of the Medical Department to discharge an injured soldier until he has been rehabilitated as well as cured. When we use that word, it is used in the ordinary sense. So long as a man is a soldier of the Army of the United States, I contend that he must only have one authority over him, and that should be a military authority.

Mr. PAGE. I agree with the Senator from New York; and under this bill that is the exact condition. When a man is restored physically, he is entitled to his discharge from the military service; he should have it; he should be released from military control; he should be permitted to return to his home if he wishes to go back; but under this bill, if he wishes for vocational rehabilitation, he is permitted to take the training provided for in the bill. I think it is all wrong to say that when a man has become functionally rehabilitated he should longer be kept under military control.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the Senator from New York has made no such suggestion, and the Medical Department of the Army has no such intention as that last expressed by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PAGE. I understood the Senator to say that the recuperation must be mental as well as physical. That seems to me to be wrong. I do not think we have a right to hold a man under military control after he has been sufficiently restored functionally or physically. He then has a right to his discharge, a right to his return home. We do not propose under this bill to compel a man to take vocational rehabilitation. We say to him, "After you have received your discharge, you may do so or you may not, as you please. If you wish to take it, you have certain money allowances made to you while you are taking your vocational rehabilitation; but we do not compel you to do it; we leave it optional with you." That is where it should be left; and we ought not to say that a man must be kept in the military service and under military control after he has become functionally rehabilitated. He should then be permitted to go home to his work, if he desires to do so; but he should be allowed to take vocational training if he wants it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, in some respects I agree with the Senator from Vermont in his remarks, and in others I strongly disagree. Of course, it should not be the purpose or the effort of the War Department to compel a disabled soldier, to use force, or anything approaching force, in reeducating him, if I may use that term, or giving him vocational training; but it is the duty of the Army authorities, if the man expresses it as his wish, to restore him to his prior condition of efficiency, if it is humanly possible. It is the primary function of the Medical Department not only to cure him physically but to cure him industrially, if it can be done. The Army owes it to every soldier to accomplish that result, if it is possible and the soldier expresses his willingness——

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, one word.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Just a moment—and the soldier expresses his willingness to have that done and his desire to have that done. Now, the vast majority of soldiers will want that done; and if they want it done they will remain soldiers until it is done; and while remaining soldiers they should be subjected to one authority, and that is the military authority expressed through the Medical Department of the Army.

Mr. PAGE. But the Senator says that the military authorities owe it to the soldier——

Mr. WADSWORTH. They do.

Mr. PAGE. I say that it is this great Nation and not the military authorities who owe it to the soldier, and it is not, in my judgment, a proper function of the military authorities to take charge of the education of a functionally rehabilitated man. After the soldier is physically able to be discharged, it is his absolute and unqualified right to be discharged whenever he demands it.

I wish to say further that the history of these matters is to the effect that when a man desires counsel and sympathy he does not go to the officer above him; there seems to be a gulf between the commissioned officer and the soldier. He prefers to go to some one other than a commissioned officer, and as a general rule he does not want to be under military control after he is well enough to go home to his work.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Whether the soldier wants to or not, the Senator from Vermont will admit, I presume, that he has got to be under military control until he is discharged from the Army.

Mr. PAGE. He should be under military control until he has so far recovered from his wounds that he should be discharged; and he should not be kept under military control one single day after he is able to return to his home, in my judgment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Who is to decide when he is ready to be discharged?

Mr. PAGE. I do not understand that to be the question raised here. The soldier himself has a right to say as to that after he has been physically and functionally rehabilitated.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator think that the soldier himself ought to have the right to discharge himself from the Army?

Mr. PAGE. He has a right to demand his discharge after he is made thoroughly functionally well.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not understand it so. If his term of service has not expired, and, in the opinion of the Surgeon General and of the military corps he is not physically fit to be discharged, I do not think he ought to be discharged until the military authorities think he ought to be discharged.

Mr. PAGE. Oh, the Senator says "physically fit." I agree with that proposition; until a man is physically fit, until he has been functionally rehabilitated, he should properly remain under military control; but the moment he is physically fit he should be discharged; he should be his own man, and should decide whether he should receive vocational training or not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Suppose that he should be discharged when he is fit to be discharged; until he actually is discharged, does the Senator think that any civilian board ought to have any authority over him while he is in the military service of the United States?

Mr. PAGE. They do not have under this bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator think they ought to have?

Mr. PAGE. I think that the best interests of the soldier should be considered; and my judgment is unquestionably that the best interests of the soldier demand that he should receive education under civilians who have made vocational training a life study.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator think that civilians who have made vocational education a life study should have anything to say about the control of a soldier under military authority?

Mr. PAGE. I agree with the Senator that until a man is discharged he should be under military control.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is all I contend for. I understood the Senator to say that whenever the man was fit to be discharged, whether he was discharged or not, this civilian board should come in and have some authority in the hospital.

Mr. PAGE. No; my statement was that I believed when the soldier was physically fit he was entitled to ask for his discharge, unless he is going to go back into the service; and of course, if he is, that changes the whole aspect of the matter. We are now discussing men who are supposed to have ended their service as soldiers; and when such a man has become physically fit, he has the right to say "I want to go," and it is for him thereafter to say whether he will be vocationally rehabilitated or not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. He has a right to ask for his discharge, but he has no right to have it unless the military authorities think he ought to have it.

Mr. BORAH. It is not wholly for the military authorities to say as to that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I was going to say that the soldier has a certain contract with the Government to which he may appeal for his discharge.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly. If his term of enlistment has expired, he is entitled to his discharge.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely; and therefore it is not wholly in the hands of the military authorities.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WADSWORTH. In just a moment I will yield. The term of enlistment is for the duration of the war; so that there is no particular time when any soldier in this war is entitled to his discharge.

Mr. BORAH. It is not wholly in the hands of the military authorities to say when the war is ended, either; the Government determines that question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield first to the Senator from Minnesota, who rose to ask me a question.

Mr. NELSON. I simply rose to say that when a soldier is wounded or disabled he is discharged upon the certificate of the Surgeon General and on his recommendation. He is not discharged because he demands it but he is simply discharged because the Surgeon General recommends his discharge. I understand that was always the practice during the Civil War, and I think it is the practice yet.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he has any information as to the percentage of men who are wounded as a result of service in this war who recover?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have heard it stated that 85 per cent of the men who are wounded recover from the shock or the wound.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If that is true, they are still available for military duty and can be drawn upon for that service, as has been frequently the case in France and England; and to say that during the period of their rehabilitation the Surgeon General's Department can not contribute to their comfort and their well-being by a form of instruction and education, it seems to me, is going a good way.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, the discussion now has extended beyond the problem presented by this bill. As the Senator from Michigan says, a very large percentage of the wounded return to the ranks.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly they do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But they are not the ones that this bill has in mind.

Mr. PAGE. I will say that of all who go over only 10 per cent have been sent back from Europe, according to the statistics of Canada.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me finish my sentence and I will yield in a moment. Those who are wounded and injured to such an extent as to cripple them more or less are the ones who are to fall within the terms of this bill, and that includes mental derangement as well as physical. It is believed by the officers of the Medical Department that the curing of those men and restoring them as much as possible to their former efficiency involves not only surgical and medical treatment but also vocational education; that the two go along together and can not be separated, and it is with that purpose in view that the Medical Department has ordered and purchased equipment for machine shops, they contending that a soldier can not be completely cured or approximately cured of his crippled condition unless he is taught to use his crippled members in the operation of machinery or in some manual operation or occupation, and that vocational training, therefore, and rehabilitation—if we may use that word again—is a part of the general treatment of the crippled or disabled soldier. You can not separate them. It commences in the ward of the hospital, to a minor degree, of course; it then extends into the convalescent hospital, where the man is well on the road to recovery, and where he is given more work of a manual character to do, and extends out into the machine shops and trade schools, which are being built and equipped in conjunction with convalescent hospitals.

All these processes are part of the general scheme for rehabilitating soldiers. The Medical Department has embarked upon it. It understands the problem. It is training the teachers. It has 200 wounded men in this country in course of rehabilitation, and I contend that there is no necessity whatsoever for this legislation.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. In order to make it a little more clear, I should like to present to the Senator a specific case by way of illustration.

Suppose a soldier is wounded, and he loses one leg, and he loses one arm. Now, until he is cured he goes to the hospital under the care of the Surgeon General's Department. When his wounds are healed and well he is without one leg, and he is without one arm. Now, I take it that soldier has the right to apply for a discharge, and he would be entitled to his discharge immediately, would he not? He is physically disabled, and on account of his physical disability he is entitled to his discharge from further service in the Army. Would he not be entitled to that if he applies for it? If he would, then the Army loses all jurisdiction over him, and the question would then arise whether, under this bill, he is taken up at that point, and whether it is not proper that he should be taken up at that point.

I am merely presenting that as an illustration—whether the Army would not lose jurisdiction of the soldier the moment he is cured and healed of his wounds. Of course I take it he would be supplied—it is their business to supply him—with an artificial leg and an artificial arm; but when that is done, if he applies for his discharge, would he not be entitled to receive it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not necessarily. That lies in the discretion of the Surgeon General and the President.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then the Senator holds that he ought to continue until he is taught the use of these artificial limbs so as to equip him for civil life?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do make that contention, and that is the purpose of the Medical Department.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will ask the Senator's opinion as to whether the bill interferes up to the point when the wounds are healed and the artificial limbs are supplied? Before that this bill would have no effect; it would not reach him at all, would it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think it would.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course in that respect there would seem to be confusion of jurisdiction and authority there, which might be harmful.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My only fear is that we shall have conflict of authority and confusion. This is a very, very delicate problem and, of course, you want the ablest men in the country to take charge of it. Personally, I have confidence in the men that the Medical Department, under Gen. Gorgas, have summoned for this work. I know they have been studying it for months. My only dread, as I say, is that we will make a wrong start. Practically every nation has made a bad start at this kind of business; but we ought to take advantage of the mistakes of others and make an absolutely correct start if it is humanly possible; and I shall always contend that the way to start out on any great piece of work is to centralize its control under one authority.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. Of course I agree with the Senator that there ought to be no mistake in starting upon this work of rehabilitation and vocational education. Now, I find in the RECORD that the Senator was asked upon yesterday under what law the office of the Surgeon General is proceeding with this work of vocational education, and the Senator did not refer to any particular statute on yesterday afternoon; but has he found one since then to which he could refer the Senate, conferring some authority for the work that is being done under the Surgeon General's orders?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I made that inquiry this morning at the office of the Medical Department, and was informed there that under the general authority granted the Surgeon General under the military law, and the construction of the language used in that authority under the military law, not only the medical and surgical treatment was imposed as a duty upon the Surgeon General's department but the complete curing and restoration of the injured soldier.

Mr. SHIELDS. Is that as far as it goes?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. The curing of the man?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not at all certain that I am using the correct words when I use the words "curing and restoration"; but the Medical Department and the War Department prior to this time, at least, have construed the authority granted to the War Department through the Surgeon General in matters of this sort to extend to the restoration of the injured or crippled soldier to a point at least approximating his prior efficiency.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, there ought not to be any mistake about that. This is a very important matter, involving the future of thousands and tens of thousands of the best young men of this country.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHIELDS. And it seems that no one can put his finger upon, or at least there can not be produced here, any statute authorizing this work that is going on. Apparently it is being done without authority, without any appropriation for it, and it may fall down at any time. There ought to be no doubt about this. There ought to be some law authorizing such an important work.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think this is section 304 of the war-risk insurance act which the Senator from Michigan hands me.

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes; I will read that to the Senator, and it does not confer any such power. On the contrary, it implies that some power is to be conferred in the future. I will read the language of it, because it was put in the RECORD yesterday as probably conferring such power, and I examined it on that account.

Section 304 of that statute is in these words:

That in cases of dismemberment, of injuries to sight or hearing, and of other injuries commonly causing permanent disability, the injured person shall follow such course or courses of rehabilitation, reeducation, and vocational training as the United States may provide or procure to be provided.

Thus clearly implying that there is nothing now authorizing such a thing, but the statute contemplates future legislation in order to carry that provision into effect, and that is the object, as I understand, of the very bill now under consideration.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can not argue a legal question with the Senator from Tennessee. I am frank to confess it is a strange thing to me that the Medical Department and the Surgeon General of the Army regard themselves now as clothed with complete authority and power to do this thing.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will say to the Senator that he knows of other things being done without authority, or, rather, he knows of cases of officers assuming to have authority in this day and time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; I have heard of cases of that sort.

Mr. SHIELDS. In such an important matter as this, the Congress ought not to go on any individual assumption.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Possibly not.

Mr. SHIELDS. It should be perfectly easy to produce a statute, if there is one, giving this power.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In view of the apparent lack of understanding as to what the situation is and as to whether or not the Surgeon General has authority now, and in view of the letter read here this morning by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] from the Surgeon General stating that so far as he and his department are concerned they do not want this bill and do not approve of it, it seems to me that we are in no condition to take final action upon the subject now; and I would suggest, without interrupting the remarks of the Senator from New York or desiring to prevent him from finishing his speech, that the Senator from Georgia would do a wise thing if he would temporarily lay this matter aside for the morning or would have it recommitted for further consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will state to the Senator that we not only considered it fully but we had the fullest hearings. The War Department was represented; the Treasury Department was represented. I have a letter from the Secretary of the Navy approving the bill. That represents the Navy Department. The Assistant Secretary of the Navy helped frame the bill, and the Council of National Defense, through Dr. Gifford, helped frame the bill. There were many of them present at the hearings. At the close of the hearing I invited anyone present who desired to say anything, especially if there were any present who were unfavorable to the bill, to let their views be heard, and there was no expression of opposition to it. Gen. Gorgas was heard, Dr. Billings was heard, and neither opposed the bill. Each approved the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator from Georgia understand that Dr. Gorgas approves the bill now?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I know he does; at least, I heard from him this morning that he withdrew opposition to it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then I fail to understand the purport of the letter read by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have seen him since that letter was written. He was in my office at 12 o'clock, and I left him there as I came to the floor of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And the letter was written at 11 o'clock?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know when the letter was written. The Assistant Secretary of War was also in my office and Dr. Russell was in my office. They were there as I left for the Senate at 12 o'clock.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think the bill——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think this is true, if the Senator will let me stop him for a moment: I think Gen. Gorgas misunderstood the meaning of a part of the language in section 6. In that section it is expressly declared:

That all medical and surgical work or other treatment necessary to give functional and mental restoration to disabled persons prior to their discharge from the military or naval forces of the United States shall be under the control of the War Department and the Navy Department.

It provides further that—

Whenever prevocational training is employed as a therapeutic measure by the War Department or the Navy Department a plan shall be established between these agencies and the board, acting in an advisory capacity, to insure, in so far as medical requirements permit, a proper process.

I called Gen. Gorgas's attention to the fact that the work of the Federal Board for Vocational Education was expressly declared to be advisory while the soldier or sailor remained in the Army or the Navy; that the control was expressly placed in the Army and the Navy while the injured soldier remained undischarged from the Army. He had the impression that it meant that the board was to interfere with what took place while the patient was under the curative processes of the surgeons. I called his attention to those distinguishing terms—"control by the Army and Navy; advice only during that period by the Federal Board for Vocational Education."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Did Dr. Gorgas express himself as satisfied with the bill after the Senator from Georgia had explained this to him?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I so understood him; yes. The suggestion was made by Dr. Russell, however, as to the word "prevocational," that different views of its meaning existed; that there was a view which restricted it very much and prevented anything that really attached to an actual vocation. The suggestion was made that a man might have an injury to his back and be detained in the hospital for a year, and during that time he might take up a line of reading or instruction that was vocational in its character, and that there was a view that the word "prevocational" meant training before the study attached to anything that would be practically used; this was a view entertained by some. Others claimed more recently that the prevocational training was the training in the hospital before the patient was discharged. I suggested that we each had exactly the same meaning in view and that if there was any doubt about the word "prevocational" I was perfectly willing to strike it out.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Now, let me ask the Senator this question, with the permission of the Senator from New York, and this is the last question I shall ask:

Under the provisions of this bill can the Surgeon General's department employ any instructors that they want to employ to furnish the vocational training or are they compelled to take somebody that the vocational board supplies?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They are not compelled to take the suggestions of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, although they are afforded the opportunity. The board is compelled to suggest men if the Surgeon General desires. That is the status of the bill. Here is an organization in closer touch with all lines of vocational work throughout the whole United States than any other in existence. The Senator from New York must excuse me; I do not desire to occupy his time. I will refer more fully to that subject in my own time later on.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Just a moment. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to the second section of the bill. He has a copy of it before him. Anyway, I can read it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the Senator proceeds to read that section, will he permit me to offer an amendment to the bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I presume the Senator from Georgia may say it is unnecessary, but from my viewpoint it is very important.

I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask that it may lie on the table for the present. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. After the word "withheld," in line 10, page 3, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, however, That no vocational teaching shall be carried on in any hospital until the medical authorities certify that the condition of the patient is such as to justify such teaching.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The second section of the bill reads as follows:

That every person who is disabled——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My attention was called by another Senator, and I did not hear the amendment read.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am reading from the second section of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I missed the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is to be printed and lie upon the table.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to see it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York has the floor.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The second section of the bill reads:

That every person who is disabled under circumstances entitling him, after discharge from the military or naval forces of the United States, to compensation under article 3 of the act entitled, etc., and who, after his discharge, in the opinion of the board, is unable to carry on a gainful occupation, etc., shall be furnished by the said board, where vocational rehabilitation is feasible, such course of vocational rehabilitation as the board shall prescribe.

That last sentence refers back to the person who is disabled; not to the person who is discharged from the Army but who is still a soldier and disabled. My interpretation of that language is that it is mandatory upon the Federal Vocational Board to give a soldier still in hospital in the Army a course in vocational training.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I had not looked at that language in that light, because it says "that every person who is disabled under circumstances entitling him after discharge from the military or naval" service.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; according to the terms of the law there cited, he could be in th service. He would be in the service, but after he was discharged he would be entitled. That is simply to designate the character of the injury, the character of the disability.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is another instance of the weakness of the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I call the Senator's attention to the language on page 2, "and who after his discharge." Of course, it refers only to the discharged soldier.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I hope the Senator will continue and read on.

And who, after his discharge, in the opinion of the board, is unable to carry on a gainful occupation—

And so forth.

But that does not imply that the function of this board shall not extend to the soldier until after he has been discharged from the Army. If that is the case, the legislation is useless on its face.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is only after his discharge from the Army.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then, there is no necessity for this kind of legislation. That conception of the bill would absolutely prevent the vocational training board from giving any advice or going into a hospital containing soldiers of the Army. That is the whole point.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; not at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield further to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator, if he desires to ask a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to say, in my judgment, it does not interfere with it at all. In other words, the soldier under the terms of the bill is not taken charge of by the vocational board until after he is discharged. Before that time he is, of course, under the control of the medical authorities.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Granting that the construction of the Senator from Tennessee is correct, it illustrates, in my judgment, at least, the weakness of the whole proposition. You are going to draw a line somewhere in that man's recovery, and up to that line the military authorities will have control of him, and beyond that line the civil authorities will have control. You have to carry on this vocational training together with the medical treatment. The one must merge in the other.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] handed me a moment ago a photograph of a hospital now nearing completion at Colonia, N. J., being built by the Medical Department, I understand, handed to the Senator from New Jersey by a citizen of that State, who has an intense interest in this whole work, and who pointed out to the Senator from New Jersey some of the buildings and their purposes. Here it is: A convalescent hospital, with the wards so arranged in such a position to the machine shop, the trade school, so that the soldier starting in the first ward, we will say, proceeds through the different wards, gradually approaching the completion of his medical and vocational treatment, and in the machine shop is terminated his treatment, all under the military authorities. Now, where, under the construction given to this bill by the Senator from Tennessee, can this advisory function commence and end, because, according to his construction, the second section of the bill would permit the board to prescribe the courses of vocational education until the soldier had been discharged.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will yield to me——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts, who rose first.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator just used a phrase about which I should like to ask him a question. He said the soldier passed from the control of the Army to the control of the vocational training board.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the construction placed upon it by the supporters of this bill.

Mr. LODGE. After the soldier is discharged the vocational training board has not any control.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Absolutely none. He is lost.

Mr. LODGE. He is lost, and he will go home.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If he wants to go home.

Mr. LODGE. It is purely voluntary. He can go home. I do not think we will have the men to rehabilitate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is the purpose of the Medical Department to persuade those men to stay in the military service until their rehabilitation has been completed, and while they stay in and maintain their obligation as soldiers of the United States they will secure that treatment and full pay, under the most skillful guidance and control that the Medical Department can summon from the civilian talent of the country.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In the insurance law the solicitude of the Government for the wounded soldier is such that even if he is discharged he may be reenlisted in order that he may complete the work which they have begun, showing that they do not need——

Mr. WADSWORTH. They may contrive to bring him back and rehabilitate him, but when he comes back he must again be under military control.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Where he ought to be until he has finished the vocational training.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to call the Senator's attention to a very important amendment that has been offered, and I believe it is going to be accepted. It was offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]:

Provided, however, That no vocational training shall be carried on in any hospital until the medical authorities certify that the condition of the patient is such as to justify such teaching.

It seems to me that is a very important amendment, and that vocational training and convalescent or medical treatment can not go on at the same time. I do not think a sick man is in a condition for any vocational training. They ought to be separate. It ought to be only after his discharge that the vocational training is given.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It seems to me that the Senator from Tennessee and his advisers, if he has received advice, have a misconception of this whole problem. I hesitate to repeat it, as I have said it so often. Of course, I am not an authority on this question, but I have it from such men as Col. Billings, who was one of the leading surgeons in Chicago, according to the testimony of the Senator from Georgia in the hearings; I have it from men high in the medical profession. I had it last summer from Maj. Brackett, who was the leader of the orthopedic surgeons in Boston, the head of one of the biggest hospitals there, that it is apparently essential in your efforts to rehabilitate soldiers who are disabled to commence the functional prevocational and indeed the vocational training while and during the period that the man is receiving medical and surgical treatment. They must go together. There is no getting away from it. It depends, of course, largely upon the character and nature of the injury. If a man loses one eye, of course, it is not necessary to give him so much vocational training. It may be necessary to give him some functional instruction and training for the use of the remaining eye. If a man loses one arm, and it is his right arm, it may be necessary to give him a good deal of vocational training while you are fitting and adjusting the artificial hand to the injured member. The two must go together. But the Senator from Tennessee and some of the supporters of this bill seem to insist that you must draw a line somewhere between the hospital treatment and the vocational education. I contend you can not do it.

Mr. RANSDELL. May I ask the Senator a question there? I think he said the same thing yesterday. Is it not absolutely necessary to have the assistance of trained surgeons while that arm is being fitted to perform its new functions? Can it be done without the constant help of a trained surgeon?

Mr. WADSWORTH. While the man is being taught to use it he should be primarily under medical control.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am about to yield the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I hope the Senator will not yield the floor because what he is saying is most illuminating. The haste with which the advocates of this bill are ready to accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire indicates that there is at least a very serious question as to the point at which the present bill would become effective and the supervision of the hospital remain in charge of the Army. They could not break in there anyway without the consent of the Surgeon General's Department of the Army, to teach anything to any patient, and, of course, it is unnecessary to have such an amendment.

Mr. NORRIS, Mr. POMERENE, and others addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I was not able to hear the debate which took place on this bill yesterday, but the first thing that impressed me was one of authority under existing law for doing what is being done. I think from what I have been able to gather I am in entire sympathy with the theory advocated by the Senator from New York, but I want to ask him if he does not think it is vitally necessary, since the question is raised here, to determine whether what is being done now by the Surgeon General is done under authority of law? That is denied, as I understand it, and if there is any question about it there ought to be more authority than what was read here this morning by the Senator from Tennessee. That does not give sufficient authority, in my judgment. There ought to be no doubt about it. If the medical department are to go on, and it seems to me they ought, and if they have not the authority now, it ought to be given them. Those who would be inclined to support the theory of the Senator from New York would still be inclined to support this bill if they are convinced that no authority exists by law and none is offered by way of amendment while we have the matter under discussion.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I simply desire to say to the Senator from Nebraska that in the general power given to the Surgeon General's Department to erect and maintain hospitals for the wounded soldiers of the war there is a very wide discretionary power.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And as to what the treatment shall consist of.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And as to the manner of treatment which shall be administered. That is wholly within his charge. If he seeks to minister to the mental welfare of the patient, that is within his province.

Mr. NORRIS. Is there any other authority than the section which was read by the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think there is in the general authority to establish hospitals. I know it is being done.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not making any suggestion or asking any question in any spirit of criticism. I am trying to get light on the subject. I agree with what the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] says. If there is any doubt about the authority existing, before we act on this bill that doubt ought to be cleared away, and if there is not any other authority except what was read, then I am convinced it is not sufficient.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I had a talk with the Surgeon General this morning, and he told me he had abundant authority, and I do not know that anything else is necessary.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish somebody would cite the authority.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is in the Army bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to have some one cite it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. To establish and maintain hospitals is sufficient power. It is amply sufficient.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I have been trying for a half hour to get permission to refer to the statute which I think confers ample authority upon the War Department to provide for this so-called vocational training as it is now being given under the Surgeon General's Office. I was clearly of the opinion when this legislation was before Congress at the last session that that power was conferred. In addition to the authority already given for purely surgical subjects, the act passed last year contains this provision:

That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire—

And so forth.

Then follows this paragraph:

Vocational training: For the employment of the necessary civilian instructors in the most important trades, for the purchase of carpenter's, machinist's, plumber's, mason's, electrician's, and such other tools and equipment as may be required, including machines used in connection with the trades, for the purchase of material and other supplies necessary for instruction and training purposes and the construction of such buildings needed for vocational training in agriculture for shops, storage, and shelter of machinery as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of section 27 of the act approved June 3, 1916, authorizing, in addition to the military training of soldiers while in the active service, means for securing an opportunity to study and receive instruction upon educational lines of such character as to increase their military efficiency and enable them to return to civil life better equipped for industrial, commercial, and general business occupations, part of this instruction to consist of vocational education either in agriculture or the mechanic arts, $250,000.

Then follow certain provisos. What I have read refers to the act of June 3, 1916, and we find this paragraph in that act:

In addition to military training, soldiers while in the active service shall hereafter be given the opportunity to study and receive instruction upon educational lines of such character as to increase their military efficiency and enable them to return to civil life better equipped for industrial, commercial, and general business occupations. Civilian teachers may be employed to aid the Army officers in giving such instruction, and part of this instruction may consist of vocational education either in agriculture or the mechanic arts. The Secretary of War, with the approval of the President, shall prescribe rules and regulations for conducting the instruction herein provided for, and the Secretary of War shall have the power at all times to suspend, increase, or decrease the amount of such instruction offered as may in his judgment be consistent with the requirements of military instruction and service of the soldiers.

I happen to know a little about a surgeon's duties or a physician's duties. The surgeon has not finished his job when he binds up the wounded arm, but one of his duties is to teach him how to use his muscles. Every skilled surgeon does that. Why may it not be a part of the Surgeon General's duties when he has these wounded soldiers in the hospital undergoing treatment to suggest under the general provision of the law that they have certain appliances with which they could be taught to use their crippled members? Certainly there can be no doubt about the authority under these statutes to do what he has been doing.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS, Mr. FALL, and others addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield, and if so to whom? There are four Senators on the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to say, if the Senator will permit me, that I think that law is amply sufficient to give the authority for what is being done.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will yield to me, I think I can show him that that has no reference to the situation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Just a moment. I simply want to say I am profoundly grateful to the Senator from Ohio for clearing the atmosphere, and to apologize also to the Senator from Ohio for my remissness in not looking up that question. It seems to me we might have all looked it up.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That statute has no bearing upon the work done in the hospitals. It is limited to handling men who are in the service, who are to continue in the service. I offered it and brought the subject before the Senate. That provision is to increase the military efficiency of soldiers at least in part.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And it is to be done, first, under rules prescribed by the President. Nothing of that sort has taken place.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Absolutely.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That provision was drawn in 1916, when we had a large number of men in camp and when we were seeking by voluntary enlistment to enlarge the Army. It was a provision for the training in camp of sound men in order to fit them by part training in vocational work to return to civil life after their military service was over.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just a moment. It does not apply to wounded men; it was not intended to apply to men of that character.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator say that it excludes them?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Under what language?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Unless they are preparing to return to military work.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Under what language?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is in part to increase their proficiency for military service. This language precludes the application to men in hospitals so injured that they can not return to military service.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I do not intend to hold the floor any longer. The Senator from Georgia may dispute the conclusions of the Senator from Ohio. My opinion is worth very little in these matters, but I join the Senator from Ohio in his, because, as I listened to the reading of that language, it seemed to me I overheard the words "to enable him to return to civil life"; and that is what we are doing when we give vocational training to disabled soldiers.

Mr. President, I send to the desk a statement which was prepared at a meeting held this morning by the executive committee of the National Education Association bearing upon this topic. I ask the Secretary to read it, that it may be incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

I desire also to say that the meeting was held this morning in this city, and that the statement springs from the fact that this very bill is under consideration in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[National Education Association of the United States. National Education Association Joint Commission on the National Emergency in Education and the Program for Readjustment During and After the War.]

Thousands of disabled soldiers and sailors are returning to American shores in urgent need of that kind of reeducation which will insure their successful return to civil life. Their restoration is a matter of vital concern to the entire Nation.

It is the deliberate judgment of the National Education Association Commission on the National Emergency in Education that the agencies to which this task of reconstruction shall be delegated be administered under a single and unified control which shall have the general responsibility for each man from the hour of his disablement to the time when he shall be as well fitted for normal civil life as medical and surgical treatment and educational training can insure.

Obviously the War Department and the Naval Department, each through its Surgeon General's office, form the natural and most effective agencies in which should be concentrated authority and responsibility for the work of reconstruction. But acting under these offices should be representatives of such Federal agencies as the Bureau of Education and the Federal Board for Vocational Education and such State and other agencies as may be asked to contribute expert services to this work. It would, in our opinion, be extremely desirable that an advisory board comprising medical, educational, industrial, and recreational authorities should be appointed to confer regularly with the officers of the departments in charge of reconstruction, but it would be quite inconsistent with recognized principles to divide the primary responsibility. Such a division could not fail to engender friction, to cause needless delay in conferences and compromises, and to threaten with failure this great responsibility which the Nation owes to the men who have risked all and sacrificed much in the service of our great cause. At this time there should be no question of any method of procedure except that which will do the very best that can humanly done for these men.

The wealth of possibilities which these men represent for important and varied civil service must be fully developed, as much for the benefit of society as for the well-being of the returned soldier or sailor. Consequently the range of employment must not be narrow nor confined to industrial pursuits. The professions of law, medicine, engineering, teaching, as well as commercial and industrial employments must be open to and made available to them. Men can and should be assigned on pay by the War and Navy Departments to existing organizations and institutions until the work of their reeducation is complete.

All educational experience substantiates unequivocally the principle of unified control; the lessons of the nations now joined with us in the prosecution of the war point to this principle as the only safe and effective guide in the solution of the problem.

This resolution was unanimously adopted by the National Education Commission on the National Emergency in Education May 24, 1918.

MARY C. C. BRADFORD,
President of the National Education Association.
GEORGE D. STRAYER,
Chairman of the Commission on National Emergency in Education.
J. W. CRABTREE,
Secretary of the National Education Association.

NATIONAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION HEADQUARTERS,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if the names of the other officers of that association are printed on this paper, I should like to hear them read. I desire to know who they are.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read the names referred to by the Senator from Connecticut.

The Secretary proceeded to read as directed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I will not ask that the other names be read, but that they be printed in the RECORD.

The entire list of the names of the officers referred to is as follows:

JOINT COMMISSION.

Executive committee: Mary C. C. Bradford, president N. E. A., Denver, Colo.; Robert J. Aley, vice president N. E. A., Orono, Me.; Carroll G. Pearse, chairman of trustees, Milwaukee, Wis.; A. J. Matthews, treasurer N. E. A., Tempe, Ariz.; and George B. Cook, member by election, Little Rock, Ark.

Board of trustees: Carroll G. Pearse, Milwaukee, Wis.; James Y. Joyner, Raleigh, N. C.; Walter R. Siders, Pocatello, Idaho; Agnes E. Doherty, St. Paul, Minn.; and Mary C. C. Bradford, Denver, Colo.

Members appointed by N. E. A.: George D. Strayer, New York, N. Y.; Harry Pratt Judson, Chicago, Ill.; L. D. Coffman, Minneapolis, Minn.; Elwood P. Cubberley, Stanford University, Cal.; David Felmley, Normal, Ill.; Mary E. Wooley, South Hadley, Mass.; W. C. Bagley, New York, N. Y.; William B. Owen, Chicago, Ill.; Nina C. Vandewalker, Milwaukee, Wis.; Susan M. Dorsey, Los Angeles, Cal.; and Thomas E. Finegan, Albany, N. Y.

Members appointed by the department of superintendence: Payson Smith, Boston, Mass.; F. D. Boynton, Ithaca, N. Y.; J. A. C. Chandler, Richmond, Va.; J. M. Gwinn, New Orleans, La.; Mrs. Josephine C. Preston, Olympia, Wash.; Frank E. Spaulding, Cleveland, Ohio; and J. W. Withers, St. Louis, Mo.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have but a word to say about this matter. In so far as the statute which has been read by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] is concerned, it does not apply to the question we are considering today at all. It applies to general vocational education in the Army—to men in active service. The words "disabled soldier" do not occur in the statute; they were not considered in the statute; and the statute has no reference to and does not include——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Just a moment. The statute does not include the class of disabled soldiers that this bill is undertaking to aid. Now I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Tennessee says that this statute does not refer to disabled soldiers.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; it does not.

Mr. POMERENE. No; but may I suggest that it does not refer to able-bodied soldiers?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes, it does; in specific terms.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is what it does.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is precisely what has been done under that statute. My recollection is—we discussed it and thrashed it all out before the Military Committee when I was a Member of the other House—what it does is to provide for vocational schools for men in active service in the Army.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. For those in active service.

Mr. McKELLAR. For the training of those in active service. Under the provisions of that law those kinds of schools have been established and have done a world of good; they have done a splendid work. It was enacted for that specific purpose, and that is being carried out to-day.

To attempt to graft on to that system a system of vocational education for disabled soldiers is an entirely different thing; and it can not be done under present law. I say to the Senator from Ohio that, from the examination which I have made of the statutes, there is not a line of legal authority for the establishment of vocational schools such as are provided for by this bill, by the Medical Department or any other department.

Now, one other matter: Considerable has been said, and a very extended argument has been made here, in favor of the medical authorities having control of this plan. I am not sure whether they are the best fitted for it or not; I am not deciding that question; but, if it is found by experience that the medical authorities are the proper authorities, the President has a perfect right to put the medical authorities in charge of the system; there is no question about that; he has complete authority under the Overman Act to put the Surgeon General's office in control of the system. But what is manifestly necessary is to have legal authority for it; and here is the authority in this bill. There is no authority in the existing statutes now; and if the officers of the Surgeon General's department are performing the work now they are doing so without authority of law and without legal appropriations. My judgment is that the advocates of the bill are exactly right in proposing to deal with the soldiers only after they are discharged.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to ask the Senator a question, but in no critical sense at all. As I said awhile ago, I am only seeking light.

Mr. McKELLAR. We are thrashing it out here to ascertain what is the better plan.

Mr. NORRIS. If this bill does not apply to a soldier until he is discharged—and I assume the Senator takes that position, and I presume that he is right, perhaps; at least, that is one construction which can be placed upon it——

Mr. McKELLAR. Qualifiedly. I will explain what I mean by that in a moment after the Senator concludes.

Mr. NORRIS. Assuming now that this bill does not affect a soldier until he is discharged, and then assuming that the Medical Department, even though this bill should become a law, did not discharge the soldier until the war is over, which they would not be compelled to do under existing law, as I understand, then would it not be in the power of the Medical Department absolutely to frustrate the object sought to be accomplished under this bill, at least until peace is declared?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is partially true. While there is no law specifically designating the time when a wounded soldier is to be discharged, yet the practice in the Army is to give him his discharge where it is found on physical examination that the soldier is incapable of performing the duties of a soldier, and the Medical Department so reports. There is never any question about that.

I wish to call the attention of the Senator and the attention of the Senate to this peculiar attitude of the subject: Say there are a dozen soldiers severely wounded, soldiers who have lost arms or legs in France. They are treated there by our medical authorities; there is no provision for giving them vocational training abroad; it would be very difficult to do so; and I presume it is not intended by anyone to join this vocational training with the treatment and convalescence of the soldiers in France; we have enough to do there without doing this additional work. So it is perfectly apparent that these soldiers have to be shipped over here before vocational training takes place; it is also perfectly apparent to anybody who will think about it for a moment that these soldiers have to be practically cured before they leave France, for the Surgeon General's Department would not put them on ships to send them over here in such a condition that they would not be able to stand the trip. Now, it is necessary that there should be a separation; that there should be a line of demarcation between the time when they leave the authority of one and go under the authority of the other. Whenever the Surgeon General's Department sends these soldiers back as physically unfit to perform military duty they are entitled to a discharge——

Mr. NORRIS. Not under the law.

Mr. McKELLAR. And what this bill does——

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator a question right there.

Mr. McKELLAR. Just a moment. This bill undertakes to deal with them after they have reached that point.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. And as Dr. Billings, the distinguished surgeon from Chicago, said in the hearings, it is perfectly idle to talk about where the authority begins and where it ends, for the work can only be accomplished by practical application and mutually courteous treatment, and the officers of the Surgeon General's Department, acting with the officers of the vocational training organization, will have to be such practical and reasonable men that these matters will be worked out in the way that will be best for the soldier. I do not take any stock in the idea that because the Surgeon General's Office is not clothed with this power, which it may want, that it is going to hold maimed and crippled soldiers in the Army until the close of the war, rather than to allow the vocational board to train them; that is inconceivable to me. Knowing many of the splendid officers of the medical department, I know they would not for a moment think of pursuing any such cruel and inhuman policy.

Mr. NORRIS. That is a point I want light on.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will be very glad to give the Senator any light that I can.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator says that when the soldier is brought back here permanently disabled he is entitled to his discharge?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand he is not entitled to his discharge as a matter of law.

Mr. McKELLAR. He is not entitled to it as a matter of law, but he is entitled to it as a matter of custom. We all know that. I have just talked with The Adjutant General of the Army about it, and he says there is no law prescribing any particular time for the termination of the soldier's service after he has been permanently disabled, but whenever the Surgeon General's Department reports that a man is permanently disabled he is discharged.

Mr. NORRIS. If this bill becomes a law, in order that it may work successfully, it seems to me it ought to contain a provision that when a soldier should become permanently disabled he would, as a matter of right, be entitled to his discharge upon making demand for it, and unless it does contain such a provision we are likely, even if the bill is all that the Senator claims for it, to put on the statute books a law that will have no effect, at least until the war is over.

I wish to submit this to the Senator: He says it has been the custom to grant disabled soldiers discharges. That is true, but there has never been this kind of a law on the statute books. Assuming now—which is a fair assumption, I take it—that the military authorities believe in this method and believe it is the proper way to rehabilitate wounded and disabled soldiers, if they should then think that the best thing for the soldier is to keep him in the Army until they have gotten through with him and given him this reeducation, as it is called—and I can see how they could believe that and be perfectly honest in their belief, and they may be right; I am not disputing that, and that is what they do believe, as I understand—would it not be their duty to refuse to give the soldier his discharge and to keep him in the Army at least until the war is over, and in that event would this bill have any effect whatever until peace is declared?

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, quite the contrary. I do not take it that any officer of the United States Army, whether in the Medical Corps or anywhere else, simply because he could not have his particular way about the treatment of a soldier, would exercise any authority that he might have in a situation like that to prevent a wounded soldier, maimed in the service of his country, from getting the kind of training that he is entitled to get under this bill. I do not believe it would be done under any circumstances. There is not an officer in the Medical Corps, in my judgment, who would even think of taking such a position.

Mr. NORRIS. But he goes on the assumption that the way to give him that training is to keep him in the Army. Now, if the Senator is right—and, of course, I am not saying that he is not, but I am taking it from his viewpoint—if he is right then why not give to the wounded and the crippled soldier, when he is found to be permanently disabled, the right to be discharged, and let this bureau commence to operate on him? As I understand, you do not intend to compel anybody to receive this service.

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all.

Mr. NORRIS. And I would not like to do that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I would not either.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, in order to carry out the very theory that the Senator is advocating, as I understand, it seems to me that there ought to be a provision in this bill entitling the soldier to a discharge when it is found that he is permanently disabled in order that this bureau may operate on him and that he may go under this bureau if he so desires.

Mr. McKELLAR. That may be a very wise provision to be inserted in the bill. I have not gone over it carefully.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to say to the Senator from Nebraska that every expert who appeared before our committee who had studied the work of rehabilitation in other countries gave us the benefit of his experience to the effect that successful work with the soldier for rehabilitation could not be done by compulsion, and that the quicker he got away from uniformed control the quicker he responded to mental development and the more certain was he to regain his former status.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, if that be true, why is it not necessary to give that soldier the right to demand and to have his discharge when he is permanently disabled?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. So far there has been no necessity for it. So far there never has been a question that as soon as he was in that condition he would be discharged; and I have no doubt that the President and the Secretary of War, if any effort should be made to confine to the hospital a soldier who was well, would promptly correct the trouble. No one has ever asserted such a right, and I do not believe they would do so.

Mr. NORRIS. It is true, as the Senator says, that nothing of that kind has ever happened in the past, but here comes a controversy now between two lines of thought, and for the purpose of the argument I want the Senator to assume—and that is fair, too, because I have no reason to doubt it—that they are both perfectly honest in the way they want to handle this disabled soldier. Here is a military man, and he says, "The way to handle this soldier is to keep him in the service. We will, therefore, not discharge him," and he is honest in that. He thinks it is best for the soldier. If that is true, the military authorities will prevent anything being done under this bill until the war is over.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all. I do not think any of them think so.

Mr. NORRIS. Then they ought to be for the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They did not come before us and oppose it. None of them opened their lips before the committee against the bill. We invited it, and there were a number in the room at the time, and no one contradicted the view taken by the experts before us.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator says there will be a conflict of opinion; that the medical authorities may undertake to thwart the operation of this bill. As I have said before, I do not think so. We are the judges of what agencies shall execute the law when passed. The Congress determines that question. The medical officers can not and would not put up their judgment against the law that Congress may pass any more than the vocational board can or would do that.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course——

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will yield to me for just a moment, when we pass this bill and put it in the hands of the vocational board the medical officers will accord with the law, just like all other men in this country accord with the law.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, when we pass this law we have still left it in the authority of the military men who are operating this same kind of hospitals under military control to prevent this law from going into effect until the war is over, because they do not need to discharge the men who are going through this treatment. There is not anything to compel them to do it, and we have given them the authority. The Senator says that we decide that; but, as a matter of fact, we decide it in just the opposite direction, it seems to me.

Mr. McKELLAR. So far as I am concerned I have no hesitancy in saying that there ought to be a time when the military authorities must give a man his discharge.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so, whether we pass this law or not. It seems to me that when a man is permanently disabled he ought to be entitled to his discharge as a matter of right; but we have never said so by statute. There is not any law to that effect.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that we have never said so by statute. I agree with the Senator entirely, and I do not see how there can possibly be any difference between him and me on that subject. I do not know why he should think there would be, when I am agreeing with him entirely.

Now, just one other point, and I think I can well explain it by an illustration.

Suppose some Member of this body has a son in the service, and that son becomes permanently disabled in France through the loss of a leg, perhaps, unfortunately; he loses that leg on the battle field in France. Of course he must be well, or virtually well, before he is sent over here. He is sent over here, and he is separated from the medical men who cured him over there. Those men can not come over with him. In so far as any influence is concerned, they ought to exert it in favor of making the best possible man out of him, physically and in every other way, vocationally and in every other way, before he leaves; but the men who have had influence over him while he is convalescent become separated from him when he comes back home.

Now, if the Senator from Nebraska had a son, or any other Senator had a son, permanently disabled, already cured of his wounds, and he comes back home, is it possible that you would want him to go back in the Army and be sent to a hospital? Do you think you would like to have him again put under military control? Do you think it would do him any good to put him under military control in the hospitals of our country?

Why, I know you would not think that as a practical question. What would you do? You would say, "Why, I want that boy to go to a vocational school, where he can be taught the thing that he is best fitted to do in the future in civil life." If he is particularly suited to some particular trade you would like the best in the world for the Government to take that boy and teach him that trade, disconnected from military jurisdiction. He is out of the military game for life. He never can go back. Now, surely it ought to be separate; it ought to be put in the hands of a vocational training board to take charge of him after that time.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator; yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I am trying to get the Senator in an attitude where he will advocate the amendment I have suggested. He says we are in harmony, but we are not in harmony as completely as I should like us to be.

Mr. McKELLAR. All I can say to the Senator is that if he will introduce the amendment I will vote for it. I can not do anything more than that.

Mr. NORRIS. It would have much more force and effect if it came from some member of the committee, of course, or perhaps from the Senator, than if it came from me.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be delighted to vote for the Senator's amendment. I can not pass it. I am sure it would have greater weight coming from the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. But take the case the Senator puts, of the son coming back. As a matter of law, under the circumstances that the Senator has depicted, the son is not entitled to his discharge. Whether this bill is passed or not, it seems to me that when he is thus disabled he ought to be entitled to a discharge on demand, and I should like to see such a provision put in this bill if it becomes a law. That ought to be the law anyway.

Mr. McKELLAR. I again say that I agree with the Senator entirely. There is no possible disagreement between us. I think that when a soldier is permanently disabled in battle he is entitled to his discharge as soon as he is well. Whether under the law or not, certainly under the practice it is so. I take pleasure in saying that I will vote for any such amendment that may be offered to this bill or to any other bill, so as to put the matter beyond question.

Now, Mr. President, just one other thing. We all realize that this bill ought to be passed. It is a great bill. The purpose of this bill can not be excelled. It has been carefully prepared. It has been carefully worked out by experts. I am not talking about the committee now. The committee has done some fine work upon it, the chairman of the committee has spent some time on it, but the bill itself has been carefully prepared and drawn for one of the highest purposes known.

That is the rehabilitation of the poor soldier who has been wounded in the defense of his country; and here at the last moment comes a scrap in the Senate upon which particular officers shall have charge of it! Some Senators seem to have forgotten the purpose of the bill in a desire to put forward, as it seems to me, a plan of certain men in some department to control it. It seems to be an eleventh-hour dispute as to which body or which organization shall control it. The President has the right to put it in one organization or another after we pass the bill. Why not leave it that way? Why not pass the bill, and then let the executive authority perform its duty in the matter. That is all that is necessary. Does anyone distrust the President to put the best qualified and most efficient organization in charge of the work?

Why, as it appears to me, here at the last minute, after everybody has agreed upon the bill, it is found that certain officers, or certain would-be officers, in one of the departments desire to have charge of this organization. Two million dollars are appropriated for the best purpose money ever was appropriated for, in my judgment, and here we are quarreling about who is going to control the $2,000,000! That is all there is in this fight here to-day. There is not a shred of anything else in it; and I just want to suggest that is all there is up for consideration. I do not know how it strikes other Senators, but I would not dare vote against this bill. I would feel like I was disgraced forever if I voted against this bill. It would be inhuman to vote against this bill. Here we are, men with all of our physical members, not one of them maimed, quarreling about who is going to enforce this very just measure! Think of it a minute! We ought to have passed the bill without a moment of delay or a word of doubt.

I hope Senators will not vote against this bill. I hope they will not do so, in their own interest as well as in the interest of these poor maimed and wounded young men who are coming back from the war. I say that it will ever arise to haunt any Senator who votes against this bill. You may have reasons why you think some other person or some other organization ought to enforce it. But when you do, you forget that the President has the right to choose any organization he thinks best to enforce it; you lose sight of the young men who need it and who ought to have it. I hope the United States Senate will not cast a dissenting vote on this splendid bill. I should like to see the roll called, and see every man in this body lined up for this just measure. There is not a man who has said a word against the purpose and intent of this bill. The only question is a petty quarrel about which officers' organization is going to carry out its provisions; and we are quarreling about it, Senators, when the President of the United States has full authority to decide the question himself. If he determines afterwards that the medical authorities are better equipped to carry out its provisions, all he has to do is to say so, and it is done; and even if we were to put the medical authorities in charge of it now, he would have a perfect right to put the Vocational Board in charge of it 10 minutes after we passed it. We are losing sight of the main thing, which is the help of the wounded soldier.

These wounded boys are entitled to have a definite law providing for a definite kind of training. They are entitled to the best we can give them. They have made the supreme sacrifice, and we must not leave them with a doubtful right to this kind of training. We must put it beyond controversy. We must put it in the hands of those who have made a life work of training the minds of men. Physicians cure the body, but it requires peculiarly qualified educators to train men in these technical employments. Let us stop this last-hour fight over authority and rival organizations and pass this bill for the benefit of the maimed and wounded boys.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I only want to take a moment.

I am in thorough accord with and indorse practically everything the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] has said, but am sorry that an apple of discord has been thrown in here in the last opinion, or possibly the next to the last opinion, of Surg. Gen. Gorgas. I wish that under the Overman Act he might be compelled to coordinate his opinions, so that we would not have an opinion from him on both sides of this subject.

As the Senator from Tennessee says, this is a great bill; and there never has been a bill here with a better purpose than this bill. It seems to me the line of demarcation is clear as between those who are opposing the bill, or at least some of those who are opposing the bill—and I say it in no critical spirit—and those who are standing for the bill. This bill does not propose to take charge of these disabled soldiers until after they are discharged. Now, that is the line of demarcation. It is voluntary, too. On the other hand, many of those who oppose the bill have a theory, which they may not express on the floor but which some of them do express privately, that these men should be compelled to stay in the Army and be compelled to take this military training. There is the line of demarcation. Shall they do this in a voluntary way, outside of the Army, after they have performed their part as soldiers and given up some part of their body—their arms or legs or their sight—or shall they stay in the Army in order to get that training? Now, that is the issue.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question right there. Will it be necessary that they stay in the Army in order that they may get this training under military authority? Because they have been soldiers, because they have been wounded, for example, in the service, would it not be fit and appropriate that the vocational training may be had under military authority afterwards and still the men receiving the training not be considered as being in the Army? That is the one problem that troubles me.

Mr. KENYON. Section 304 of the war-risk insurance act has been referred to as giving authority now to the War Department to do this work. I call the Senator's attention to a portion of that section which I think answers his question:

> Should such course prevent the injured person from following a substantially gainful occupation while taking same, a form of enlistment may be required which shall bring the injured person into the military or naval service.

That is, he enlists again to get this vocational training. Now, it seems to me that a man who has gone across the sea and suffered these injuries, who has given up a leg or two legs or an arm, when he comes home, if he does not want to take this training, ought not to be compelled to take it. It ought to be entirely optional with him. If he wants to go to his home and stay there, and not learn any other occupation, that is for him to decide. Most men, of course, will want to engage in some line of work; but I feel that we ought not in any way to compel the soldier to take this training.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa further yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. I certainly quite agree with the Senator in that proposition. He ought not to be compelled; there ought not to be any authority, military or otherwise, that would seem to compel him to take this training. I shall be glad if the Senator will again refer me to the section he has read.

Mr. KENYON. It is section 304 of what we commonly call the war-risk insurance act.

On the line of demarcation the Senator from New York speaks of there is nothing to prevent the Army going ahead and helping these boys while they are injured and lead them along the line of vocational training as they may. The bill does not stop that.

When the discharge comes then comes this bill and the work under the bill. There may be an overlapping that is unfortunate, of course, but I do not want to assume that the Medical Corps of the Army and the Vocational Board are going to get into any controversy over that. I want to assume that they are both patriotic and that both have but one object in view, the good of the soldier. If they have not, it is an unfortunate situation. If little jealousies of Army cliques are going to creep in to injure and destroy the working of such a great bill as this, it is very unfortunate. I believe there will be complete cooperation. There will be some lapping, but I believe that the Medical Board can do their work and the Vocational Board their work, and that the provisions of this bill will in great measure help these boys we have drafted, these boys who have been sent over there; and it is the smallest thing we can do now to help them in any way we can.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. KENYON. I am through.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question. Does not the Senator think he puts the matter a little too strongly; indeed, in such a way that an unjust inference might be drawn from his statement when he says that the sole question at issue is whether the men who are receiving this vocational training and are being physically rehabilitated shall be under civilian or under military control?

As I have understood, if the Senator will pardon me, the attitude of the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. WADS-

WORTH] and others who have combated in a friendly way some of the provisions of the measure under consideration, was this: That the soldiers who are wounded will, while they are in the hospital and receiving medical attention, be in such a mental and physical condition as that they can receive vocational training. Undoubtedly, the condition of many will be such that perhaps for weeks or months, while they are receiving medical treatment, they may also receive profitable and advantageous instruction along vocational lines. Many of the injured and wounded ones will be able, while they are being treated and restored, so far as restoration is possible, to devote considerable time to mental and physical effort. Indeed, many patients more rapidly convalesce if their minds and hands are occupied. A certain amount of work will be advantageous to those receiving attention from medical authorities furnished by the Government. If this course is pursued, then it is obvious that with the hospitals there must be some agency or school—the name is immaterial—competent to instruct the patient and, in the language of the bill, "rehabilitate" him.

An important question, therefore, arises: Would it not be wiser for the same persons who are caring for the wounded soldiers, who are with them daily, who know their physical infirmities and physiological idiosyncrasies, who know their mental and psychological condition, to assume the control or superintendence of their vocational training? It would seem that the medical authorities should have charge of all vocational instruction imparted to the wounded soldiers as long as they were receiving medical treatment. It is a fair question to consider as to whether it would not be better to have the educational training alongside the medical training, and whether it would not be wiser for those who are giving the medical training to plan for the vocational work necessary to aid the soldiers in preparing to assume some useful place in the industrial world. This plan would not necessarily mean that the vocational training must be given exclusively or in part by the physicians and surgeons who treat the soldiers. There could be provided suitable aids who could instruct the injured ones, working and instructing under the direction and guidance of the doctors, who would best know the conditions of those to be trained and instructed.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator has not any question but that the patriotic men in the Medical Corps would be glad to give all that knowledge to the vocational board and every man in charge? The Senator has not any question but that our hospitals will be busy enough taking care of the sick and wounded not to indulge in much vocational education? In my opinion the hospital is not a very good place for vocational education.

Mr. KING. There is a great deal of truth in that. If the Senator will pardon me, I will just state a concrete case that will perhaps illustrate my point of view. I have in mind a man who was injured in a mine. His leg was so injured that it was amputated. For one year he was at the hospital. The greater portion of that time he was able to go around the yard and to walk with crutches for a considerable distance. The entire year was lost to the individual; his time was wasted and his mind was not improved. The greater part of that time if there had been a machine shop or some place attached to the hospital where he could have received instruction or vocational training could have been profitably employed by him. Under the direction of the surgeon if the hospital had been prepared for teaching trades or for instructing in any useful branch of industry he could have been trained and gone from the hospital better prepared for useful service. It has been claimed by some who have given attention to this subject that vocational training could be carried on at least in a limited way with the medical attention given by the Government. I have understood from the debate here that in some of the hospitals the Senator from New York adverted to this plan is being pursued and proper equipment has already been provided for quite intensive vocational training. Indeed, buildings suitable for such training have been built adjoining or near to the hospital. It seems to me that in many cases the very best results would be had where that procedure was carried out rather than to leave them in the hospitals and then send them home and let them determine whether they should go back to some place and receive vocational training.

I can readily believe that most excellent results could be obtained in many cases by such a mode of procedure as this. I can see grave objections to a scheme that leaves the patient for months or years in a hospital without instruction or any attempt to prepare him mentally or vocationally for entrance into life's activities, and then when he is turned out from the hospital cured, so far as medical science can cure, the Government for the first time attempts to train him for work and labor. Why not do all that can be done to train the injured soldier during the period he is receiving medical treatment? Physicians are indispensable in teaching wounded and injured persons. The discipline while in the hospital and while under military control would be of some benefit in getting the soldier started upon the highway of education, vocationally or otherwise.

Mr. KENYON. I agree with the Senator about that, but does he not think also that the boy would do better in vocational training if he gets away from being in the Army during that time, goes out of his own free will and decides what he wants to do? In other words, does the Senator believe that the entire vocational training should come to him while in the Army? Should he be kept in the Army in order to get the vocational training?

Mr. KING. If I may be permitted to reply, I do not quite understand that the plan suggested by a number of Senators who have participated in the discussion contemplates that he should be in the Army all this time, although he might be receiving the instruction from men who were in the Army or in the Navy of the United States. But expressing my own view—and it may be wrong, it is an empirical view, not one resulting from study of the subject—I am of the opinion that, assuming that there will be competent instruction in connection with the medical treatment, the same vocational training that would be given in the schools, contemplated under this bill, there would be as good or better results if the work is intrusted to the Medical Department with some military control. I am inclined to think—though I have no fixed view upon the subject—that the men who are in the hospital receiving medical treatment and subject to the control of the Government would make greater progress and attain more satisfactory results if their vocational training were commenced while there and under the direction of the medical authorities. Of course, there is much to be said in favor of the plan suggested in this bill. Every Senator is in favor of a broad and comprehensive plan to vocationally train the boys who bravely and loyally offer their lives for country and for civilization. But what is the best system to adopt to secure the best results will provoke differences of opinion. We are all anxious to adopt the wisest plan. The newness of the subject of necessity will occasion discussion and develop a contrariety of views.

Mr. KENYON. That is a fair issue, and I respect the Senator's opinion about that, although I have a different opinion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to inform the Senator that all the testimony of experts and those who have had experience was contrary to that view. Right along those who have been handling it gave us the opinion to the contrary and illustrated it by practical results.

Mr. KIRBY obtained the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me that I may ask the Senator from Utah a question?

Mr. KING. I am occupying the floor in the time of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I yield the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will be delighted if the Senator would yield that I may ask the question.

Mr. KING. I will be delighted to answer it, if I can.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah is not entitled to the floor in his own right, but the Chair will permit the Senator from Tennessee to ask the question, if there is no objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to ask the Senator this question: As I understood him, he stated that he thought this training and treatment should go on together at the hospital and be carried out by the hospital authorities. Does the Senator propose that we should establish these vocational institutions in France? When the soldier is under the control of the hospital he is going to be in France, and he has got to be made physically well before he can be brought to this country. This question that arises under the Senator's view of the case, I do not see how it can be carried out according to his view unless we are to establish these schools in France. If we do, I say to the Senator we have to buy the land and construct the schoolhouses or additions to hospitals where they can be trained. I imagine that would cost us a good deal more than the $2,000,000 provided in the bill.

Mr. KING. Replying to the question propounded by the Senator from Tennessee, of course the mere statement of the question answers itself. I have no understanding that the Government of the United States purposes giving vocational instruction in France. I do understand that the Government is now constructing many hospitals in various parts of the United States for the purpose of receiving the wounded soldiers who will be brought back from the bloody fields of battle across the sea. Already there are hospitals now under the control of the Government into which the wounded soldiers are being taken as fast as they are returned to our shores. It is that class of soldiers with whom we are about to deal and to whom I alluded in the few observations I made when I interrupted the Senator from Iowa.

But, Mr. President, this matter presents itself to me in this angle: There are to be erected a large number of hospitals. Already in some of these hospitals preparations have been made for vocational training. Already buildings have been erected, shops have been established, the necessary equipment has been purchased and provided to give vocational instruction to wounded soldiers.

It must be obvious to all that many patients while they are receiving medical attention may at the same time receive some educational advantages, may be taught along various lines, may receive mental and intellectual training, as well as vocational and industrial training. If it be wise to have established with the hospitals institutions where there may be intellectual or industrial or occupational training, why would it not be wise to continue the same man in charge of the soldiers—when their physical wounds have been healed, as far as human skill will effectuate a cure—and direct the continuation of their vocational training afterwards?

Let me illustrate my point of view. A person is wounded. He loses a leg or an arm. While he is receiving his medical attention in the hospital to which is attached the buildings and equipment for vocational training referred to by the Senator from New York he receives vocational training. It may be imperfect and incomplete, but it is the beginning, and will increase as his physical condition improves. He may be there three months, five months, or a year receiving medical attention.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remind the Senator from Utah that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] has been recognized and is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KING. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. KIRBY. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas yields.

Mr. KING. Let me complete the illustration, and then I shall be happy to yield.

As I was observing, this person who was wounded may be in the hospital for months receiving medical attention. During that time he may receive vocational instruction from men there provided, and who are competent to deal with this case. At the end of five or six months he is cured, so far as medical science can effectuate a cure. Would it not be better for him to continue his training there under the same supervision, directed by the skilled men of science, who knew his physical and mental condition, under the same teachers, than to go to some remote point, among strangers, among those who do not fully sympathize with his situation and needs, be subjected to the interruption that would result and, so to speak, start all over again? That thought has occurred to me as this discussion has proceeded. And in view of the fact that we are establishing institutions for vocational training as a part of the hospitals erected by the Government, it occurred to me it might be wise to continue the vocational training, at least in some instances, under the same jurisdiction and under the same management.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KIRBY. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator suppose that the surgeons who are treating these persons in the hospitals will be their teachers?

Mr. KING. If the Senator from Arkansas will pardon me, in what I have said I have proceeded upon the premise suggested by the Senator from New York and other Senators, that already the Medical Department of the Army or of the Government have made provision for vocational training, that they have employed teachers and were instructing teachers and had made elaborate provision for training the wounded soldiers while receiving treatment at the hospitals. It would seem to me if such be the case we are interrupting a design and a plan perhaps the consummation of which has not yet been realized, but which has made such progress as that its consummation may soon be realized and the results be all that could be desired.

Mr. McKELLAR. I merely want to ask one question. Has the Senator ever been in a hospital? Does the Senator think a man suffering from a wound, permanently disabled, is in a condition of mind to take on vocational training at the same time? I want to say that I have undergone a serious operation in a hospital, and I am sure that while I was recovering I could not have learned anything vocational or anything else.

Mr. KING. Of course, if the Senator from Arkansas will pardon me, any personal ailment I might have which would take me into a hospital would not be a subject of discussion upon the floor. I might add, however, that I have been in many hospitals, and I am of opinion that many persons who are in hospitals for treatment, if the hospitals were equipped for vocational training, could be greatly benefited by being taught by competent persons under the direction of the physicians in charge.

It is not indispensable to this plan—that is, of giving vocational training under the direction of the military authorities—that the soldiers should remain indefinitely in the hospital ward.

As I have said, this subject is one of great importance; it will affect many thousands of our brave soldiers. We should not rush through a measure committing the country to a policy that may prove to be defective and inadequate. Many Senators have had no chance to study the question. Few Senators have read the hearings. It does seem to me that we have not had sufficient light upon the matter to determine which plan is superior. There is much to be said in favor of civilian control; there is much that commends a plan under which the medical authorities of the Government shall take charge of this great and humane undertaking.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I desire to propose an amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Senator from Georgia has an amendment to strike out a word from the bill. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 18, strike out the word "prevocational"; on line 24, page 5, and on line 2, page 6, strike out the word "prevocational."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not formally submit the amendment, but stated I was willing to have that done. If no member of the committee present objects, I will submit it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas submits an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 3, after the word "hereof," insert "and also for the benefit of all persons injured in civil employment so severely as not to be able to follow their usual vocations who shall likewise be entitled to such instruction without cost therefor under the usual regulations."

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I have listened with much interest to some of the discussion here. Before I go any further, however, I wish to say that I think we have the most undesirable system of discussion and debate in the United States Senate that I have ever seen in vogue anywhere in the world. A Senator gets up here to talk, and before he finishes 15 others have injected their speeches and their own views into his speech and we have no connected view of anyone. But that seems to be the practice, and I am not going to complain about it further.

There was a suggestion, however, that some petty strife among officials or some self-seeking had gotten into this measure, or the discussion at least. I do not know whether that is warranted or not. The question is, What is best to be done with the wounded soldier or sailor? The man who has been called into the service of his country and has been wounded, who is not able to take care of himself thereafter, and whom the Government is interested in providing with such employment as that he will be able to support himself and not become a public charge, that he also may contribute to the production of wealth and the promotion of the welfare of the country. That is the chief reason, when you get down to the bottom of it, for the education of these men and their rehabilitation, because of the Government's selfish interest to prevent them from becoming a public charge and in order to utilize, if possible, their ability to promote the general welfare and contribute to the productive wealth of the country.

We are not educating them or rehabilitating them solely because they have become heroes, because they have responded to their country's call to arms and nobly discharged the duty required of them. It is true that that is considered also; but as the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] so well said, we have already established a system of vocational schools. If they are becoming a success, why might not that system be continued and enlarged? It is worth the effort and worth the trouble and worth the expense. Why have two systems, as has been well said, if the one regarded necessary and which has been established has reasonably successfully met the demand?

I understand one branch of the National Educational Association has concluded, out of the wisdom acquired from experience in educational matters, that this sort of education can be best provided under the direction of the Medical Department of the War Department. At least the report read here showed that. I had not thought about it along that line before, but there was a question asked that brought the matter to my attention seriously along another line.

Should the soldier or sailor, wounded so that he can not follow his usual avocation, be required to attend the school under military regulations, or should the school be provided and he be allowed to go to the school if he thinks it advisable to do so? We require him by law to go into the Army or the service of his country. He has been wounded and crippled in that service. He has been taken care of as well as the Government could do it; and now ought not the Government, if it provides this other instruction and this agency for his rehabilitation, to require him to take advantage of it? We have required him to risk his life and his fortune. He has become injured. He does need the rehabilitation. Ought he not to be required to take advantage of the instruction and training when the Government, at great expense, provides the institutions therefor?

If he does not take advantage of it what good has been accomplished by establishing the schools? If we are not going to require that he shall avail of the training, if experience indicates that the compulsory is not the best system, and we are going to have a voluntary proposition that all may have the benefit of this education who come within certain classes defined herein, then why not permit the civilian employee, the man in civil life who has been injured so that he can not follow his usual occupation, to go to this particular school and allow him the benefit of it? He is a citizen of the United States. He has been injured in following his usual calling, he was supporting himself and his family, self-sustaining, independent, and contributing to the promotion of the welfare of the country. He is in need now of this sort of instruction, and I say he ought to be permitted to take advantage of and benefit by the training in these institutions provided by the Government and supplied for the benefit of persons in like condition, regardless of where the injuries disabling him were suffered or received.

It seems to me that ought to be considered, and that is the reason why I have offered this amendment. If this training is to be taken out from under the jurisdiction of the board where we have already started it, if it is to be put entirely in another control, then there is no reason why we should not educate the man injured in employment in civil life just the same as we rehabilitate the soldier or sailor who has been wounded in battle.

The same selfish reason that the Government has in all of it—to make the citizen self-sustaining and an asset instead of a liability—obtains in one case with like force as it does in the other.

The Government wants to keep its citizen from being a charge upon the public. It wants to put him back in such a condition as that he can support himself, support his family, and contribute to the production of wealth and the promotion of the public welfare. When you get down to the bottom of it that is the principal reason for this rehabilitation, or one of them, and applies to one injured man just as well as it applies to the other.

When we have provided these schools, built these institutions, selected the instructors, supplied the apparatus, why shall not these other men have the benefit of the reconstruction training that is already provided? I believe it ought to be done.

I have offered this amendment to section 3. I wish Senators would listen carefully to this. In section 3 there is instruction provided which shall be available without cost for the benefit of any person who is disabled under certain circumstances or coming within a certain class. Then this amendment provides likewise that people who are so injured in civil employment that they can not follow their usual vocations may have the benefit of this free instruction. That is inserted just before the proviso:

Provided, That no monthly compensation, family allowances, or expenses as provided by this act shall be paid on account of any such person availing himself of the courses under this section.

There would be no embarrassment to the Government there. The particular class for whom this instruction is provided are not allowed to be paid any expenses at all. They only get the free instruction. When you have established and furnished a free institution, then it ought to be furnished alike free to these other men who have been unfortunate and who would be benefited by it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before the Senator takes his seat let me suggest to him that there are 100,000 employees injured in industries. Does the Senator think it would be possible to undertake to handle them in the next 12 months and with this fund? Would it not be wiser to undertake to begin work, if it is to be done with those injured in industries, say, in 1920? I wish also to ask the Senator if he has read what is found in the testimony of Dr. Little covering this point?

Mr. KIRBY. I saw that provision. It is not probable that 100,000 men who are injured in industrial life will apply for admission to these schools any more than it is probable that if we leave it under civilian management and outside the Army regulation anything like all the men who are injured in the Army will apply for instruction here. With reasonable regulation they could accommodate the people who would apply, and I think the law ought to be such that they would have the right to apply under these conditions. The institution is already established for that particular purpose, to rehabilitate men of this kind, and it makes no difference, so far as the education is concerned and the training and instruction that is given, whether a man had his arm cut off while he was working down here on a railroad between two cars or whether he got it shot off, so far as the arm being gone and the necessity for his rehabilitation is concerned.

It seems to me that this amendment ought to be put in the bill.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate only a short while on some features of the bill that I think we ought to consider very carefully before enacting it.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Medical Department of the Army and the Navy are already proceeding under the law to take care of the wounded soldiers and sailors of the Army and Navy. The letter which I read yesterday from Gen. Gorgas, Surgeon General of the Army, written on the 27th of last month, shows that the Army contemplates the physical reconstruction of disabled soldiers, and he defines physical reconstruction as the completest form of medical and surgical treatment carried to the point where maximum functional restoration, mental and physical, has been secured.

Another part of the letter says that:

The Medical Department of the Army has assigned the following general hospitals—

For what purpose?—

for the reconstruction of disabled soldiers.

Then it names a number of them, as follows: St. Elizabeths Hospital, Washington; General Hospital No. 4, Fort Porter, N. Y.; General Hospital No. 13, Dansville, N. Y.; General Hospital No. 16, New Haven, Conn.; general hospital, Fort McPherson, Ga.; general hospital at Lakewood, N. J.; at Walter Reed Hospital in this city; general hospital at Camp May, N. J.; Roland Park, Baltimore, Md.; general hospital at Fort Ontario, N. Y., and several others that are indicated by number.

In other words, Mr. President, the Medical Department of the Army has already assigned for the reconstruction work of our wounded soldiers a number of general hospitals. It was my privilege and great pleasure several days ago to visit the Walter Reed Hospital in this city, and I commend to any Senator who is interested in the subject a visit to that great institution. If I understand correctly, it has already completed about 1,200 beds and is rapidly adding more. It is already doing a considerable amount of vocational reconstruction work. I saw young men there making beautiful bead work, baskets, and fancy linen. I saw them working in the blacksmith shop and in the carpenter shop. Various and sundry kinds of work are going on there now in this Capital City. They are enlarging the hospital all the time. It seemed to me, Senators, that the work there is a magnificent conception, as is the way in which it is carried on.

In connection with the offer of the great benevolent society of Elks to appropriate $1,000,000 for the purpose of building three reconstruction hospitals in this country, I have had several conversations with officials of the Medical Department of the Army. New Orleans desired to have one of these hospitals; Boston desired another one of them. The hospital at Boston, I understand, is under way at Park Hill, Boston—a great reconstruction hospital, built by money furnished by the Elks, with the understanding that it would be turned over to the Government when completed, to be used for reconstruction and vocational work among our disabled soldiers, and to be used in the same character of work after the close of the war for those injured in industrial accidents.

The people of New Orleans were anxious to have one of these hospitals, and a beautiful spot containing 10 acres of ground was selected for the purpose. I called on Col. Billings several days ago—a man whose name has been mentioned several times in this debate, one of the most eminent surgeons in America and the world—and talked to him about this hospital. He said: "Senator, the plans are entirely too meager; we need at least 80 acres of ground, instead of 10, on which to construct a proper reconstruction hospital." He went on to describe the number of buildings that would be needed in conjunction with the main hospital. He had a great, broad conception of it. His idea was that there should be one central directing mind and office force carrying on that great work, and, in cooperation with that central and directing mind and force, the injured should all be trained in some kind of human endeavor; the blind, those with mental defects, those who had lost one or more members or had suffered some other injury, should each be trained in a suitable pursuit. As the result of that training these men would be prepared to earn their living and to better fill their place in society after their training, in many instances, than ever before.

It is true, Senators, that men sometimes, as the result of an accident, become far more learned and perhaps fill more useful callings than they did originally. I remember a friend of mine who, when a young man, was a carpenter—a highly honorable calling—and had his hand badly hurt, so much so that it could not push the saw or drive the plane. He was forced to study law, and he became one of the great lawyers of America as the result of that accident. If we properly look after our young men who are wounded and maimed and become halt and blind in this awful war, we shall make of many of them more effective citizens, more efficient men than they were before. We ought to do it by all means.

There is no difference of opinion on the floor of the Senate in regard to the merits of this work. The only difference here, as I understand, is whether or not we shall interfere with the present splendid work which is being carried on by the Medical Department of the Army under the leadership of that great man, Surg. Gen. William C. Gorgas; a man of whom every American should be proud, who 20 years ago had the honor of eradicating yellow fever from Cuba when our soldiers were there in the War with Spain; who later performed the herculean task of restoring healthful conditions on the Isthmus of Panama—conditions which were absolutely necessary to the performance of the great engineering feat of constructing the Panama Canal. That great man is now the Surgeon General of the Army; and I sincerely hope he will hold the place for many years. He is going on very nicely with this work. It has been assigned, as I have shown from his letter, to a number of hospitals. The reconstruction work will be assigned to a number of other hospitals from time to time. More of them are going to be built; many communities are going to offer exceptional advantages to the War Department for carrying on this work, hoping and believing that when the war is over the institutions that have gotten a good start under the lead of Gen. Gorgas will become first-class hospitals for those disabled by industrial accidents.

Now, we have another branch of the Government which is charged somewhat with this work—the War-Risk Insurance Bureau. Under section 304, which has been referred to several times, it is the duty of the War-Risk Insurance Bureau to provide artificial limbs and members of various kinds to the wounded soldiers, and also to furnish vocational education for these poor unfortunates. After having the War Department proper, through its Medical Corps, undertake this work, and they having carried it on for months—and they are carrying it on now very successfully—are we going to now create a third organization? After giving considerable authority to the War-Risk Insurance Bureau to do similar work, are we going beyond that, and call in the Vocational Educational Board?

Mr. President and Senators, it seems to me we are going to have a great duplication of effort here. It is an old adage that "too many cooks spoil the broth." I believe this broth is going to be spoiled if we add any more cooks; and I, for one, sincerely hope it will not be done.

There has been so much argument here about the necessity of the doctors in charge continuing their work with the wounded soldiers until they have also been trained vocationally, that I do not know that I can add anything to that, except to say that the argument appeals to me very forcibly. I was talking this morning with Col. Billings, and I asked him if it was not essential that the surgeon should watch carefully the efforts of the vocational teacher when a man had lost his arm, for instance, and a new arm and hand were put on him, and he was being trained to articulate the fingers and properly use that arm. He told me that in such a case it was essential to have the surgeon in constant cooperation with the vocational teacher, and we can readily understand the necessity for that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. For a question?

Mr. RANSDELL. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator has stated that the War-Risk Insurance Bureau is charged with this duty. I desire to say to him that I know of no law that charges that bureau with such a duty, nor of any appropriation; and they have never done anything in connection with it. I also challenge the view that the Surgeon General's department has any further duty than that which is connected with curing the patient.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will read to the Senator what the war-risk insurance act says.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I know what it says.

Mr. RANSDELL. Well, there is a difference of construction, of course.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. One at a time, if the Senator from Tennessee please. I will yield to him in a moment. I read from the act of October 6, 1917, amending the war-risk insurance act. After creating the board that act goes on to say:

SEC. 304. That in cases of dismemberment, of injuries to sight or hearing, and of other injuries commonly causing permanent disability, the injured person shall follow such course or courses of rehabilitation, reeducation, and vocational training as the United States may provide or procure to be provided.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And we are arranging by this bill to procure and provide for it.

Mr. RANSDELL. Under the law which was read by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] it is the duty of the War Department to provide this training. The law specifically says it must be done. I know the Senator from Georgia takes the view—at least I understand he does—that this provision was limited to the men before they had done any fighting.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. RANSDELL. Well, some Senator took that position.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I said it specifically referred to men in active service.

Mr. RANSDELL. If men in active service are to be taken care of and vocationally trained, surely those who have been wounded ought to be fully provided for in every way; and that is our contention.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is what we propose to do.

Mr. RANSDELL. The law specifically says that it is the duty of the Medical Corps of the Army to take care of these men; and the "proof of the pudding is in the eating of it." We are talking about it, and the Medical Corps is doing it. They have a number of these men under treatment right now; and if we do not interfere with them by the passage of this bill they will continue to do the most magnificent work of caring for these poor boys as they are brought back from "over there" from day to day.

Now I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I merely wish to say to the Senator from Louisiana that—and I had something to do with molding the particular act to which he refers over in the House Committee on Military Affairs—I am sure that neither the act which has been referred to by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] nor the war-risk insurance act gives the slightest authority to the Surgeon General for performing this work. Outside of that, however, the Senator from Louisiana says that "too many cooks spoil the broth." According to his own statement, they have got two cooks at it now.

Mr. RANSDELL. And the Senator wants to add a third.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think we had better take it out of the hands of two and put it into the hands of one.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is not done by the pending bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think we ought to do that by law. The two cooks who are attempting to cook this particular broth are at loggerheads, I presume, and if they are both trying to do it they are both acting without authority of law. My judgment is that we ought to put it in the hands of one cook acting under the authority of law.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will say to the Senator that he is utterly mistaken in thinking that the War Department is at loggerheads with the War-Risk Insurance Bureau. They are getting along magnificently. I have talked to a number of officials and they say the work is proceeding——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. Pardon me—the work is proceeding splendidly. I have demonstrated that here two or three times, and we have had the evidence of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], his personal testimony, as to what he knows. There is no friction in the world; but let me ask Senators as fair men, suppose, under section 6 of this bill, if it should be enacted, the Vocational Board sends a number of men into each hospital to act in an advisory capacity and they advise differently from the surgeon in charge of the hospital, what is going to happen? There is going to be disagreement——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. Just a moment. There is going to be a row, and as the result of that row and that disagreement I fear that we are not going to get along as well with the work, as peacefully, as quietly, as happily, and as successfully as we ought.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to inquire if I am to understand from the Senator's remarks that no further legislation is necessary?

Mr. RANSDELL. Here is a letter which I received from the Surgeon General of the Army this morning—I do not think the Senator was present when it was read some time ago——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I was not.

Mr. RANSDELL. It is dated May 24, 1918. I have read it once, but it is very short and I will read it again for the benefit of the Senator from New Mexico. It is addressed to me, and is as follows:

DEAR SENATOR RANSDELL: In our conversation this morning concerning the vocational rehabilitation bill, No. S. 4557, I think it a mistake to enact this bill at this time concerning this matter.

The Medical Department is already acting upon a law of Congress passed on this subject, and all these bills cause delay.

There is ample authority for doing all that is necessary in this field under the law recently passed by Congress by which we are at present acting. I fear that a bill of this kind, which gives another department authority to come into our hospitals in an administrative capacity, would cause friction in administration.

Very truly, yours, W. C. GORGAS,
Surgeon General, United States Army.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me first ask the Senator from Louisiana a question.

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Did not Gen. Gorgas subsequently say to you that he withdrew his objection to this bill?

Mr. RANSDELL. He said to me that he had agreed to withdraw his objection to the bill, but he still held the same opinion expressed in this letter; in other words, I think the Surgeon General is very much in the position of a man who, being convinced against his will, is of the same opinion still. He is of that opinion as strongly as a man can be.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield further to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Did the Surgeon General point out the law under which he conceives that he has the authority?

Mr. RANSDELL. He did not, but the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] read the law, and to me it is very clear. Although there is a difference of opinion as to its meaning, as I construe it, it gives ample authority; and the Surgeon General thinks he has ample authority, for, as a matter of fact, he is proceeding under that law. Now, I will say this to the Senator——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. Just one moment. If the Surgeon General has not ample authority under the law, he certainly is proceeding as though he did have; and it would be better for us to amend the law and give him the authority rather than to confer the authority on some outside agency, such as the Vocational Board, because certainly the Medical Corps of the Army is the one which is going to have most to do with the care of our boys.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. RANSDELL. I have yielded to the Senator from New Mexico, who, I understand, has not concluded.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I was going to inquire whether if any authority is supposed to be derived from the act to which the Senator referred a few moments ago, the act passed at the last session of Congress to authorize the establishment of a war-risk insurance bureau in the Treasury Department?

Mr. RANSDELL. I understand that under that law the War Risk Insurance Bureau would have the right to direct that vocational work be done. I do not understand that they have ever directed such work; but they would have the authority to do it, and they could confer the authority, as I understand, on the Vocational Board or on the Medical Corps of the Army, whichever they saw fit.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I took considerable interest in the framing of the act to which reference has just been made, and, if such authority is conferred in that act, it certainly is a surprise to me. The only purpose of section 304, as contained in that act, as I take it, was to control the question of the payment of compensation in the event disabled soldiers did not follow the course of instruction which might hereafter be provided and prescribed.

Mr. RANSDELL. Does the Senator deny that there is authority in the law somewhere to establish hospitals and carry on the great and merciful work of rebuilding our soldiers, which is now being carried on? We are certainly doing it now; under what authority are we doing it?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. We have ample authority for the cure and treatment of our disabled and wounded soldiers; but there is no provision that I know anything about which justifies the work that comes within the scope of this bill. There is absolutely nothing in the law anywhere, of which I have knowledge, which would have any tendency to bring the rehabilitated into touch with the industries of the country, to secure employment for them, to get in touch with the business interests of the country, and to ascertain the particular occupations disabled soldiers can best pursue.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I ask a question of the Senator from New Mexico, with the permission of the Senator from Louisiana?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator from New Mexico contend that the act of June 3, 1916, which, as I remember, contained a provision to the effect that the Secretary of War or the War Department may install vocational training in the Army for men on active service, is not applicable to this situation and does not give the Surgeon General the power to proceed along this line?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not understand, Mr. President, that that bill confers such power.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I should like to say to the Senator from New York that I do not think that has anything to do with it at all, or that it gives any authority for any such work as is contemplated under the pending bill. If the Senator will examine the terms of that act he will find that that provision was for men in active service.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Just on that point——

Mr. McKELLAR. Schools have been established for such men, but the pending bill provides for the training of men after they have been mustered out of the service. It is an entirely different situation; an entirely different appropriation is required, and it will be used for an entirely different purpose. There is not one scintilla of authority in the act the Senator has read for carrying on such work as is proposed by the pending bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. With the permission of the Senator from Louisiana, let me comment on the statement just made by the Senator from Tennessee. The bill before the Senate does not apply in its terms to men who have been mustered out.

Mr. McKELLAR. To men who have been discharged.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Nor to men who have been discharged. It relates to men who have been disabled.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And discharged.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Otherwise there would not be conferred on the vocational board by this act the advisory power or function to go into the hospitals to help in the treatment of soldiers who have not been discharged, and that is what this bill does. It gives to this board the advisory function to send its representatives into military hospitals, and in military hospitals there are no discharged men; they are all soldiers.

Some emphasis has been placed upon the words "active service." A soldier who has been wounded is not withdrawn from active service in the sense of the military meaning of the term. The contrary of "active service" is inactive service, which is not service with troops and without any jurisdiction of military officers, but the soldier is sent to his home——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Just a moment—and is there placed upon inactive service. The only other kind of service in the Army that is not active service is when the soldier is passed to the reserve and stays at home. Under the military definition a wounded soldier in the hospital is not upon inactive service or in reserve, but he is in active service. The law from which the Senator from Ohio read this morning is applicable to soldiers upon active service, and that applies to wounded men.

Mr. McKELLAR. But the trouble about it is that the bill under consideration does not apply to that kind of soldiers; it only applies to a soldier after his discharge under the very terms of the measure.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My point in bringing this matter up is that the Senator from Tennessee, the Senator from Georgia, and the Senator from New Mexico, inferentially at least, have contended that the Surgeon General has no authority to-day to go on with the work of vocational training. I contend he gets that authority from the act of June 3, 1916.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On what page of that act is the authority given?

Mr. WADSWORTH. My recollection is that it is the act of June 3, 1916.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator is correct, and I will read the provision for him.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What page?

Mr. RANSDELL. I read from page 34 of the act of June 3, 1916, entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," as follows:

In addition to military training, soldiers while in the active service—

And, like the Senator from New York, I say that a soldier who has been wounded but not discharged is still in active service—while in the active service shall hereafter be given the opportunity to study and receive instruction upon educational lines of such character as to increase their military efficiency and enable them to return to civil life better equipped for industrial, commercial, and general business occupations.

In carrying out that act the Army appropriation act approved May 12, 1917, has this provision on vocational education:

For the employment of the necessary civilian instructors in the most important trades, for the purchase of carpenters', machinists', plumbers', masons', electricians', and such other tools and equipment as may be required, including machines used in connection with the trades, for the purchase of material and other supplies necessary for instruction and training purposes and the construction of such buildings needed for vocational training in agriculture, for shops, storage, and shelter of machinery as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of section 27 of the act approved June 3, 1916—

And section 27, I may say, is the provision which I read a few moments ago—authorizing, in addition to the military training of soldiers while in the active service, means for securing an opportunity to study and receive instruction upon educational lines of such character as to increase their military efficiency and enable them to return to civil life better equipped for industrial, commercial, and general business occupation, part of this instruction to consist of vocational education either in agriculture or the mechanic arts, $250,000.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that answers fully the question of the Senator from New Mexico as to whether the existing law grants this authority. That is the law applicable to soldiers engaged in active service; and, if we are making provision to give vocational training to soldiers engaged in active service, can any fair man say that does not apply to a soldier who, while in active service, is wounded, is shot down, whose leg is cut off, whose arm is cut off, or whose eyes are put out? What need has a soldier for vocational training if he is not hurt? He must be hurt or injured in some way to need vocational training. He is in active service when he gets hurt, and then he needs vocational training.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think the fair construction of that law would be that it was intended to rehabilitate the soldier for the purpose of retaining him in the active service of the military department of the Government?

Mr. RANSDELL. Why, not at all. Of course, if the soldier meets with some kind of an accident—let us say, an auto runs over him and breaks his arm, which has to be cut off, or he loses his foot, or he contracts consumption or rheumatism, or something of that kind—unquestionably soldiers of that sort would be sent to these hospitals and restored. I saw a number of them out at Walter Reed Hospital. I saw a man from my own State who had contracted rheumatism, and he is out there being treated. But could you contend that it does not also apply to the soldiers who are injured on the fighting line? Have we made provision, let me ask, for the men who are in the cantonments, and none for those who are on the firing line?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We are going to make provision for them.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not conceive it that way; but if we are, let me say, let us do a great deal better than the miserable little pittance of $2,000,000 which is carried in this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The present appropriation under the other bill is only $250,000.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will ask the Senator whether he thinks that under the existing law a disabled soldier has a right to remain in the active service and not be discharged from that service until after he has been rehabilitated?

Mr. RANSDELL. I think he has, under a fair construction of the terms of this law. It says we are to give him vocational education and train him so that he can go back restored into civil life again; how is he ready to go back into civil life as a remade man until he has had the training, and how is he to get that training unless we keep him long enough to give it to him? I think the fair construction is that the poor fellow shall be kept until he is cured, until he is ready to go back into civil life, with his functions in just as good shape as it is possible to make them.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then, Mr. President, that seems to me to be announcing a very drastic doctrine here—that under our law at the present time, whenever a soldier is disabled, he must be retained in the Army until after he shall have been rehabilitated and made competent to return to civil life and engage in some useful occupation.

Mr. RANSDELL. Does the Senator think it would be doing too much for that poor fellow?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. No; I do not.

Mr. RANSDELL. Of course, I would not keep him there against his will. I do not want the Senator to understand me in that way.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. But either the law which the Senator has just read means that the soldier shall not be discharged from the public service until after rehabilitation, or else, it seems to me, it can not be subjected to the interpretation which the Senator puts upon it.

Mr. RANSDELL. There certainly ought to be a reasonable discretion on the part of the medical officers in discharging that man. We know they have a reasonable discretion. If the man were in such condition that it would take years and years to restore him, and he was very unwilling to remain there and be restored, perhaps they should discharge him without it; but I say to the Senator that the humane construction, the reasonable construction, is that they ought to keep him and put him in condition to resume his former avocation before discharging him.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then, I will ask the Senator if he thinks that under existing law it is a matter of discretion with the Surgeon General as to whether he shall retain these soldiers in the active service or discharge them?

Mr. RANSDELL. To a very great extent, I think it is. I think he has a right to keep control of them until they are sufficiently cured to be returned to the Army if possible. If they are well enough to go back into the Army, he ought to send them back to it; and if they are not, he ought to send them into civil life as nearly as possible in condition to perform the functions which they performed before, or similar ones, or, at least, he should do his best for them.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to remark, just at this juncture, that it is my thought that after a disabled soldier has received medical treatment and has been restored to health as far as he can be, if it is then ascertained that he can no longer serve in the military branch of the Government effectively he should be discharged, and that the purpose of this bill is to furnish cooperation by skilled experts who will make a study of these questions, and who will be in touch with the industrial interests of the country, to aid and assist these surgeons and hospital people in the work while the soldier is in the hospital; but when he has been physically restored, when the hospital has done all that a hospital ordinarily would do, together with this prevocational training, such as will be necessary in the treatment of the soldier or such as can be given while that treatment is in progress, that then we will take hold of him. He will be discharged from the Army, and then the board created by this bill, which will be in touch with the activities of the country, will be studying industrial conditions, and will be better able to bring him into actual contact with living affairs than the surgeons or doctors in a hospital.

As the law now stands, while it is construed to give ample authority to do all that is necessary while the man is in the hospital, yet it was felt that it needs to be supplemented by this law to care for the soldier after he leaves the hospital, and to give the hospital authorities the benefit of the advice of expert people who will be employed and engaged in the work of taking hold of the soldier after the hospital treatment has ended.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just for a question?

Mr. RANSDELL. Just a moment. I have yielded for a question, and a speech, too. After I have replied to that I will yield to the Senator, with great pleasure.

In response to the Senator from New Mexico, who is always eloquent and logical, I wish to say that he presents his case very forcibly. Now, let me present it as it seems to me.

The Senator talks about taking care of these boys after they have been discharged. Where are you going to place them? Suppose there are five or six boys from Louisiana, and a dozen or more from Texas, and six or eight from Arkansas, and five or six from New Mexico and all that locality, all of whom have been discharged—in the aggregate, one or two hundred. They have been discharged, now, before they have been given this vocational rehabilitation. Where will you place those boys under this bill? There is appropriated here the very small sum of $250,000 for renting buildings and hiring quarters. Are you going to take care of all the discharged boys from our European war in the buildings hired or purchased with this $250,000? Why, Senators, it is an impossibility.

On the other hand, we already have a number of great hospitals in existence. We have splendid men in charge of these hospitals. We have a large corps of trained nurses in them. We necessarily must have a number of vocational teachers in connection with those hospitals; for every Senator admits that a great deal of this vocation work must be done before the soldier is discharged. All the Senators admit that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, Mr. President, I desire to express my dissent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. RANSDELL. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I admit that some training may be done, but nothing comparable to what is done after they leave the hospital.

Mr. RANSDELL. All right; I accept the amendment, that they must have some vocational training.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I did not say they must have some. I said some could be done there.

Mr. RANSDELL. Well, let us put it that way—some could be done. If some could be done, with the consent of the Senator from Georgia, I imagine that some would be done; and, as a matter of fact, I know it is being done right now at Walter Reed Hospital, because I have been out there and have seen it. It is being done all over the country. They contemplate having annexes, shops, places of various kinds in connection with all these hospitals to do the work. Now, Senators, will you stop that great work after we have carried it to the point where these young men are pretty nearly rebuilt, are pretty nearly retrained and rehabilitated? Will you stop it and force them to go out in some institution purchased with the $250,000 carried in this bill?

I live in Louisiana, and should like mighty well to see a great reconstruction hospital built in New Orleans to serve Louisiana and the surrounding States. I know that one is going up now in Boston. I hope it will serve well the State of Massachusetts and the surrounding States. I know a dozen or more of them are already in actual use in different parts of the country for the purpose of serving the surrounding sections. Where will you get these vocational schools?

Senators, if you vote for this bill, bear in mind that you must start several great additional institutions; that it is going to cost a great deal of money; that you will have to acquire training schools, vocational educational establishments; you will have to place at the head of them highly trained men; you will need a corps of nurses and of physicians to help, because everyone says that there must be physicians to help along with the vocational training. It is separate and distinct institutions that are contemplated in this bill, and they are going to cost a vast amount of money. This method can not possibly do the work any better than it is being done now. It is a fifth wheel to the cart, in my judgment, and it ought not to be enacted.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield now?

Mr. RANSDELL. Gladly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I take it that the Senator is in favor of the purpose of this bill. Is that correct?

Mr. RANSDELL. Oh, absolutely. I do not think there is anything nobler than to train over the unfortunate young men who are injured in this war. I will go further and say that I am in the heartiest sympathy with vocational education for those hurt in industrial accidents, and I shall do everything in my power to provide reasonable—I say "reasonable" advisedly—assistance from the National Government to assist in giving vocational training to the injured of every kind.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator says he is heartily in favor—and I know he is, because I know he could not be otherwise—of the purpose of this bill. The Senator, of course, is perfectly familiar with the provisions of the law recently enacted which gives the President the right to rearrange organizations.

Mr. RANSDELL. Perfectly.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator knows, therefore, that the President will have the right to put the Medical Department in charge of this work after we pass the law.

Mr. RANSDELL. Why, certainly; he would have that right; but why should we ask him to perform our function?

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one minute. Then, if the President has the authority and can do it, and if the Senator is in favor of the purposes of the bill, would he be willing to vote against this bill simply because the particular department that he wants to have charge of it does not have charge of it?

Mr. RANSDELL. Why, of course I would, because I believe that that particular department which I think should have charge of it is especially well qualified to take charge of it, and I believe it has charge of it now. I believe that the man at the head of it is one of the greatest men in America, and I do not want to see that great man and his department interfered with by bringing in other men. I think the work will be done very much more effectually under him if we give him free scope. If he needs any more authority, then I want to give it to him; but I do not want to bring in an outside institution like this Vocational Board.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then the Senator is more concerned about some particular department having control of this matter than he is about the rehabilitation of the young men who have been wounded.

Mr. RANSDELL. Absolutely not. The Senator can not put that construction upon what I have said.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. One moment, and then I will yield to the Senator. My whole thought is to do the best I can for our brave boys who are now trying to save the civilization of the world, and are going to save it; but I favor this because I believe it is the best method. Everybody knows what our Medical Department can do, because of its long record of effective service. Everybody knows what it is now doing. Why bring in an outside institution?

I now yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was going to suggest to the Senator from Louisiana that if the Senator from Tennessee is so willing to invoke the power of the President under the Overman Act, why introduce this bill at all?

Mr. RANSDELL. That is a very good suggestion, because the President could give the Vocational Educational Board this authority as the law exists now. It does not need a change of law.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. RANSDELL. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire, if the Senator will permit me, to reply to the statement made by the Senator from New York. I want to say in reply to that statement that of course it is true that I voted for the bill giving authority to the President to transfer and rearrange these departments and to coordinate them, and it applies to just such a case as this, except that as the matter now stands the President would have no authority whatsoever to establish a training school for disabled soldiers. He would have no more authority, under the present condition of our law, to establish a vocational training school for permanently disabled soldiers than would the Surgeon General or any other department of the Government—none whatever. The President is without authority and some law has to be passed. This is a beautiful illustration of the wisdom of that; for if, as the Senator from Louisiana argues, only the Medical Department are fitted to carry on this work, all they have to do is to demonstrate that fact to the President of the United States and he will immediately take it out of the hands of the Board for Vocational Training and turn it over to the Medical Department. Are you not willing to trust the President of the United States?

Mr. RANSDELL. Undoubtedly I am.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, if you are, we are talking about nothing, because he has a perfect right to do just as he pleases.

Mr. RANSDELL. I never like to make the President do vain things. I never like to throw upon him a responsibility which I should assume myself. His shoulders are broad but his duties are very grave and onerous. We ought to attend to this matter ourselves, and when there is no necessity for this act I do not want to see it passed. We have law enough now. The Surgeon General says he has law enough. We all know that the world is governed too much. In my opinion, we are passing too many laws, anyway. I should like to see us quit.

I do not see any necessity for this bill. If I did, I would unquestionably vote for it.

I want to ask the Senator a question. He wants me to yield my views on this matter. He says that I am hard-headed and that I can not trust another authority to go in there. I will ask him why he so persistently insists upon another organization coming in here to do work which is now being done in a very large and effective way under the statutes as they exist?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will take the greatest pleasure in answering the question. I do so because Gen. William C. Gorgas, my life-long friend, one of the finest men I ever knew in my life, and one of the greatest surgeons the world has ever known, came before our committee and frankly said that he was in favor of this bill as it was written, or virtually so; and upon that authority of the Surgeon General I say that I am in favor of this bill.

Mr. RANSDELL. Of course, all I have to say is to refer to the letter of Gen. Gorgas, which I have read.

Mr. McKELLAR. Here is his testimony in the record.

Mr. RANSDELL. Let his testimony be read, and let that letter be read. That is all I have to say on that subject.

Mr. President, I have about concluded what I wish to say.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this is a very important piece of legislation. I know of nothing more important than to do everything humanly possible to restore to society, and to a happy place in life, the young men who are wounded in this awful war. We can do a great deal to make them useful and happy members of society if we do what is possible to be done. We ought to do it. There is no question about that and no difference of opinion in regard to it. We ought also, Mr. President, to lay the foundation broad and deep for the reconstruction and rehabilitation of the innumerable human beings in this country who every year lose their arms or their legs or their eyes in accidents of various and sundry kinds. The total runs into very large numbers. Most of these poor persons are thrown on the human junk pile, their lives saddened and darkened as a result of accidents which happen to them. We can care for them; we can brighten their lives; we can give them a new start, and many of them we can enable to earn greater compensation than ever before. The legislation which we pass at this session and the work carried out in response to that legislation on this vocational and rehabilitation plan will lay the foundation for industrial vocational education throughout this Republic. We should consider carefully what we are doing. I do not believe we have considered this bill as carefully as it should be considered. I think, Mr. President, it should be recommitted. I think we should have more evidence on this bill. I think we should understand it more fully than we understand it now.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The committee advertised their hearings for two weeks. They put them freely into the newspapers. They notified the War Department, the Surgeon General's Department, the Treasury Department, the War-Risk Insurance Bureau. They invited representatives of each of those departments to come before them, and they came before them. We held open hearings for three days. Through the English ambassador, we brought before us the director of this work in Canada. We brought before us from New York the director of similar work for the Red Cross. We finally threw open the doors and invited anybody who questioned the propriety of passing this bill to speak. There were a dozen representatives of the Surgeon General's office present. Not one objected to the bill, and the Surgeon General himself said that he did not object to it.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, in response to that, all I know is that I have been up to the Surgeon General's office, and I have talked to a number of the men up there, and there is not one of them but decries the bill in the strongest terms and thinks it would be most unfortunate to have it passed. Now, I do not doubt in the slightest everything the Senator from Georgia has said, but let me repeat that I have read here what the Surgeon General says. Everybody knows that I could not coerce him. Everybody knows that I am no great lawyer cross-questioning witnesses before a committee. These witnesses were before the Committee on Education and Labor, and it was a committee favorable to the bill. It was a picked committee, desiring to pass the bill, and direct questions were asked. I used to practice law. I know the trick of asking a direct question which the witness must answer "yes" or "no." That is largely the nature of the testimony given before this committee. I was told by one of the most prominent men in the War Department that the testimony of the Canadian gentleman who appeared before the committee is not complete; that we ought to have it a great deal more full and complete than it is now.

I know that this bill is not satisfactory to me, Senators, and there is no great rush or hurry to pass it of which I am aware. Why can we not recommit it? Why can we not have it more fully examined into? What is the objection? I am not asking that the bill be defeated now. I am asking to get it recommitted in order that we may be more sure of the situation. See how uncertain it is. Here is a letter from the Surgeon General and a statement from the Senator from Georgia which contravenes the statement in the letter.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Since he wrote——

Mr. RANSDELL. He told me he still had the same opinion conveyed in that letter, but had agreed to withdraw his objection to the bill provided certain amendments were made to it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And he withdrew it.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is what he told me—that he had agreed to withdraw it, but he still believed as stated in his letter. There are perhaps such things as withdrawals and withdrawals.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He told you he withdrew his objection to the bill?

Mr. RANSDELL. He did; I told him I had already read the letter in the RECORD. He said, "I believe the opinion stated in the letter is right, although I have agreed to withdraw my objection to the bill." I would not have presented the letter if it had not been already presented. Fortunately for this debate, and for the facts of the case, and for the good of our soldiers in my judgment it was presented before Gen. Gorgas called me out.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The opinion of the Surgeon General is that "though convinced against his will, he is of the same opinion still."

Mr. RANSDELL. That is exactly the impression he made on my mind. Anyone who will go down to his office and talk to him, or to Col. Billings, or to anyone of a number of other prominent officers in the Medical Department, will discover that they are all a unit in their opposition to this bill. They feel that their corps is doing magnificent work, which is apt to be interfered with if this bill is passed. They would like to be let alone, and I, for one, sincerely hope we will not interfere with their very successful efforts by enacting this measure which, to say the least, is of uncertain propriety.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, just one word in reference to what I understood to be the attitude of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], and that was that there was a picked committee to consider this matter, a committee made up to favor the passage of the bill.

My recollection is that this bill has been considered more faithfully and more carefully than 19 out of 20 of the bills that come to us. The Committee on Education of the House and the Committee on Education and Labor of the Senate met day after day and day after day and heard witnesses from all sections of this country and from Canada, and when we got through with our hearings and after the compromise measure now before us had been agreed upon the members of the Committee on Education of the House were so impressed with the wisdom of this bill that they withdrew their own bill and substituted the Senate bill in its place. If ever a measure was considered and considered faithfully and carefully, and if ever a measure received the unanimous and hearty support of every member of the committees of both Houses, as far as I know, I think it is this bill.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will say to the Senator I did not use the word "picked" in any disagreeable sense at all. I simply meant that it was the Committee on Education and Labor charged with this kind of legislation, and naturally it was enthusiastic about it. The men in charge of it were men who for years, to my certain knowledge, favored the passage of the vocational education bill and were naturally interested in it. I was interested in it myself. I was glad to see it pass, and if I had been the author of it, like the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], I should be glad to see its functions enlarged. Certainly it was a favorable committee. You have enlarged the functions of your pet. It was your pet for years. That was all I meant; not in any offensive sense at all.

Mr. PAGE. I simply wish to add one word, and that is that the Committee on Education of the House and the Committee on Education and Labor of the Senate are committees that, in my judgment, would hear and consider fairly a measure of this kind, and when they make unanimously a favorable report, as they did in this case, as I am informed and believe, I think that report is entitled to great weight on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall not occupy the Senate more than 10 or 15 minutes.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Smoot
Borah	Johnson, S. Dak.	Page	Sterling
Brandegee	Jones, N. Mex.	Pittman	Sutherland
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Poindexter	Swanson
Cummins	Kellogg	Pomerene	Thomas
Curtis	Kendrick	Ransdell	Tillman
Dillingham	Kenyon	Saulsbury	Townsend
Fall	King	Shafroth	Trammell
Fernald	Kirby	Sheppard	Underwood
Fletcher	Lenroot	Shields	Wadsworth
France	McKellar	Smith, Ariz.	Walsh
Gallinger	McNary	Smith, Ga.	Warren
Gerry	Nelson	Smith, Md.	Watson
Gulon	Norris	Smith, Mich.	Weeks
Henderson	Nugent	Smith, S. C.	Wilfley

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to announce the necessary absence from the Chamber of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] on official business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. McNARY. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], is detained on official business.

Mr. WATSON. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. NEW] is detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, there is no law under which the Surgeon General or his branch of the Government would do what the Senators think they are doing but which I feel confident they are not doing. What they are doing is simply to carry on a certain line of work in connection with the hospitals as an incident to medical treatment. They have not undertaken, and they have no legal right to undertake, any vocational training or education beyond that which is an incident to their medical treatment.

The act referred to by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] does not give any such authority. It was passed in 1916. I may say I was the author of the provision put into the military bill. It was in a time of peace. It had no reference to wounded soldiers in hospitals, but to soldiers in active service, and the vocational training was to be a part of their service in camp, limited to a training which did not interfere with their military service.

The provision said "soldiers while in active service," and at the close it said that "the training shall be given under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War, which may in his judgment be consistent with the requirements of military instruction and service of the soldiers." It had no reference to soldiers who were about to be mustered out of the service on account of physical disability. There is, however, the right under the general appropriation for the Surgeon General's office to treat soldiers who are injured and to give them such physical training as may help restore them to a sound condition.

The Senator from New York read a list prepared by somebody showing what is supposed to be going on in Fort McPherson, at Atlanta, Ga. I live in Atlanta, Ga. I am very familiar with Fort McPherson. If that is the kind of rehabilitation the soldiers are to get, then let us concede we do not intend to do anything to rehabilitate the wounded. They have had at Fort McPherson as many as a thousand soldiers of the Regular Army at a time. They had a little blacksmith shop for their own work. They had a little tin shop. They had little shops around the fort. It is called a fort. It is not a fort at all; it is a large barracks.

They have little places for various kinds of work to be done for their own use. There is a little paint shop at which they painted some of their own things that needed painting; but as to having any kind of an organization or any kind of a place where such men could get training that could be called real training such as this bill contemplates, I am sure there is not anything of the sort there, and no such training has been given.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator state when he last visited Fort McPherson?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think it was some time last year. But I am confident opportunity for substantial vocational training has not been there provided. I do not think there are any wounded soldiers there; if so, scarcely any.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As a matter of fact, there has been quite a large number of troops at Fort McPherson. There are very large quartermaster supplies there.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not say it was not a large quartermaster-supply station. Atlanta is the headquarters for the distribution of all quartermaster's supplies. It is true that they have the largest warehouse there certainly south of the Potomac from which to handle the supplies, but it is not at Fort McPherson. I was speaking of wounded soldiers.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There are some there getting this training to-day.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is not any of this training that amounts to anything there. They could take a soldier, if they wanted, and put him into their paint shop and let him dip a brush into a paint pot and rub it on something, but that is not what we mean by this bill. That is not the scheme we have in view. We desire the Surgeon General's office to do this little tinkering around the hospitals while the men are in the hospital and help them as much as can be done, encourage them, and start them on; but this bill proposes to take the soldier, after he is discharged, who is disabled, and rehabilitate him through vocational training.

I have a list of the varied lines of employment to which they have been sent by direction in Canada; 194 different lines of occupation into which they have gone. Some have gone to agricultural schools. The Senator from Louisiana spoke as if there was an agricultural school out at the Walter Reed Hospital, near here. There is a little garden. At the agricultural schools the soldiers will have the benefit of a board of trained teachers prepared to really give them help. They can be placed there under this bill, utilizing that part of the fund which places them in existing institutions. There are various kinds of institutions throughout the country already existing to which they can be sent. They are taught in 194 different lines of work in Canada. They are placed at times in manufacturing institutions, without pay, for practice. They are placed in mercantile institutions; they are placed in commercial institutions; they are placed in all kinds of industries for training. They are placed in all kinds of industrial schools. It is not simply to teach them a little handwork in a paint shop; it is, broadly, to take hold of these boys and find out what is in them, and finding out what is in them, to give them a chance to bring it out, that they can still be men and not suffer the distress through life of not being able to do anything, dependent solely upon their country's help.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. May I ask the Senator if in Canada they are taken into the vocational schools voluntarily?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Entirely.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. After the army has discharged them?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Entirely.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They have left the army?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. This is simply in furtherance of a plan to make them more self-supporting?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is it exactly. The experience in England, the experience in Italy, the experience in France, the experience in Canada is that the real development of a man comes when he gets away from the uniform; when he is no longer under control of a man with a uniform. The army trains for obedience, for machine work. What we want to do is to retrain these boys for self-dependence, self-initiative, self-reliance.

The testimony before our committee from the experts was that the sooner they could be free from the control of the uniform the more rapidly they responded in all respects to their rehabilitation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask a question purely for information, because I think the Senator from Georgia has correctly analyzed the bill. If the hospital under the military department of the Government is to do no more than suggested by the Senator from Georgia, and if his bill, which I think is correct, takes a soldier only after he is discharged and has become a civilian, why not strike out section 6 and eliminate all connection between the vocational establishment which it is proposed to create and the Army?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. For this reason——

Mr. CUMMINS. And let us have an end to the discussion on that point.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am giving the Senator my explanation of that. There will be for a while in the hospitals men doing some vocational work. There is some good vocational work which is done there of a preliminary character. Occasionally there would be a man with an injury, say, to his back, who must be kept in the hospital for 12 months. If he is physically in a condition to do it, it is important that he should be at once helped.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is tinkering, as the Senator from Georgia has well said. That is not really a part of the educational process that the Senator from Georgia has in mind.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; just let me go a step further. It is exceedingly desirable that the men selected to help in those places should be well chosen. We do not believe we should require the Surgeon General's office to take the suggestion of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, but we require that they should confer. In Canada the civilian commission are required to take control of vocational work in the hospitals. They put into the hospitals the men they select. We do not think that was wise, but we require the board to confer with the representatives of the Army and Navy as to the hospitals, and to cooperate with them by giving their advice as to men suitable for the work, but we leave the Army and the Navy free not to take these suggestions unless they wish. I believe it will bring about a condition of complete cooperation between the Vocational Board and the Surgeon General's office. I believe that so perfect a system will grow up between them that when a hospital needs a man of a certain character to do vocational work they will confer, and the Vocational Board will help to select him. I believe we can bring about perfect cooperation.

I think this is the great chance to do something for our fellowmen, and especially those of them who have been the boys at the front fighting for us. I think their good will wipe out selfishness in the Army and elsewhere and make both willing to subserve the interests of the man and forget everything else. When they reach that point there will be no conflict between them. Only selfishness and littleness will produce conflict——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. May I ask the Senator——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am going to yield the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the motion to strike out the word "prevocational" apply to all of section 6.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; the three places.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And you also strike out the word "and," in line 3, before the word "vocational," on page 6?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not object to "prevocational" there. There is no objection to it on page 6. It is stricken out where it occurs by itself, but where it was used conjunctively it covers all kinds of education.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But the word as used in section 6 would undoubtedly give color to the idea that the training was to take place while the wounded man is in charge of the surgeons in the hospital. There ought not to be any conflict in that regard and would not be, I think, if the word "prevocational" was not used.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not object to striking out "prevocational" there.

Mr. McKELLAR. Before the Senator takes his seat will he yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Michigan is asking me a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I suggest to the Senator from Georgia that, as a part of his motion, I believe that the words "prevocation and," on page 6, line 3, should be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That has already been done.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Not the word "and."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By direction of the Chair it has been done.

Mr. McKELLAR. I merely desire to ask the Senator from Georgia this question. Our esteemed friend, the distinguished Senator from New York, has made a number of arguments on this floor urging us to follow the example in this war of England and Canada. I think it has been mighty good logic on his part, and I indorse it. I think we ought to do it wherever they have made a success of war propositions. As I understand the Senator—and I hope he will clear it up if I am wrong—this bill follows the experience of Canada, which is situated precisely like the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Except in one respect. In Canada they allow their vocational board to designate the teacher who goes into the hospital. Here we leave that to the Surgeon General, but give him the benefit of the advice of the vocational board.

Mr. McKELLAR. But substantially it is identically the same system?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Barring that, it is practically the same. England more recently has come practically to the same plan. In Italy it is the same plan, but their work is largely confined to agriculture, because their rank and file of troops are principally from rural sections.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator from Georgia will pay some respect to the suggestion that I made yesterday; $800,000 of this $2,000,000 appropriation is devoted to the payment of salaries and for the expenses of employees and for administrative purposes. Already the vocational board has a very large appropriation for administrative purposes. The board is already in existence. There is no additional machinery to be created. Of course, when the bill will become a law it will involve the creation of a few new officers and require the services of additional employees. It does seem to me that $800,000 out of the $2,000,000 appropriation is entirely too much for salaries, compensation, and administrative purposes, particularly in view of the fact that the machinery already exists, and a large appropriation has been made for administration purposes.

I wish the Senator would consent to an amendment reducing the appropriation to $300,000 where $550,000 is provided in the bill for the salaries of employees, and that the appropriation of $200,000 for administrative purposes be cut down to $100,000, in view of the fact that the machinery is already in existence.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish I could yield to the Senator's request, but I can not. A large part of their work is employing teachers. The teachers who instruct these men will do a great part of the work. It is an educational work. It is vocational training. We require them to file quarterly reports of their expenditures, of the salaries paid and the persons to whom paid. We have had not the slightest reason to believe that this board is anything but a careful, painstaking board. They have prorated this money according to the experience of Canada as to the expense in the operation of the work. I would not feel justified to accept his suggestion, and I hope the Senator will not press it. He is always on the side of economy and cutting expenditures, but do not cut this time.

Mr. KIRBY. I ask that the amendment I have proposed be read and that the section be read with the amendment included in it as it would read if the amendment were adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY]. It will be read and the section will be read as it would read if amended.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 3, after the word "hereof," insert the following:

> And also for the benefit of all persons injured in civil employment so severely as not to be able to follow their usual vocations who shall likewise be entitled to such instruction without cost therefor under the usual regulations.

So that if amended the section will read:

> SEC. 3. That the courses of vocational rehabilitation provided for under this act shall, as far as practicable and under such conditions as the board may prescribe, be made available without cost for instruction for the benefit of any person who is disabled under circumstances entitling him, after discharge from the military or naval forces of the United States, to compensation under Article III of said act and who is not included in section 2 hereof, and also for the benefit of all persons injured in civil employment so severely as not to be able to follow their usual vocations who shall likewise be entitled to such instruction without cost therefor under the usual regulations: Provided, That no monthly compensation, family allowances, or expenses as provided by this act shall be paid on account of any such person availing himself of the courses under this section: And provided further, That nothing in this section shall deprive any such person of the benefit of the provisions of said act.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I only want to say this: I am not opposed to taking care of those who are disabled in the industries; I am very anxious to do that; but to put the entire number of those who are disabled in the industries upon the Federal Board of Vocational Education, with this limited appropriation, would make it impossible for them to do the work which this bill contemplates their doing.

What I would ask the Senator to do would be to join us, after we pass this bill, in preparing a bill to start in 1920 caring for those who are injured in the industries. We shall then have had 12 months' experience with our work, and shall know what we are doing. We would then be in very much better condition to take up something for them.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will not prevail, for I believe we should not enter upon any great work like this except with a condition attached to the legislation that the States themselves should bear a proportionate share of the expense. At this time to take upon the Government the whole burden of this work would be entirely out of harmony with our previous action on vocational education. It seems to me that we ought not to burden the bill at this time with the Senator's amendment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I should merely like to make this further observation: While I am heartily in favor of the purpose of the amendment, yet we have never engaged in any of this work before. We have not the teachers; we have not the equipment to take upon the Government at this time such a large burden as this amendment would impose. I therefore think that this is not an opportune time to enter upon that work. After we get the law in operation as to disabled soldiers and operate under it a while, then we can easily take on this additional burden; and I think we can then do so to very much greater advantage.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, for the benefit of those who have not heard the discussion of the amendment I would suggest that it only provides that people who are injured in industrial employments shall be furnished the same free tuition as is proposed to be furnished soldiers under like conditions, none of their expenses, however, to be paid. As I understand, the establishment is there with the instructors provided and with the apparatus furnished. Under those conditions I do not see why a man who has been injured in civil employment may not have the benefit of such instruction.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KIRBY. I ask for a division.

The question being put, on a division the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New York will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, in line 9, after the word "who," it is proposed to strike out the words "is disabled under circumstances entitling him, after discharge," and in lieu thereof to insert the words "has been discharged."

Mr. WADSWORTH. The succeeding part, let me say, Mr. President, is part of the amendment which the Secretary has not as yet read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the statement of the amendment.

The SECRETARY. And on line 11, after the name "United States," it is proposed to insert "because disabled under circumstances which entitle him."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, perhaps I can with more facility than can the Secretary read the section as it would read if this amendment were adopted. It would then read:

That every person who has been discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States because disabled under circumstances which entitle him to compensation under Article III of the act—

As contrasted with the present language of the bill, which says:

That every person who is disabled under circumstances entitling him, after discharge from the military or naval forces of the United States, to compensation—

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and many other Senators who support the bill have reiterated many times that the purpose of this proposed act is to give to the Federal board jurisdiction over men after they have been discharged from the military service, and my amendment is for the purpose of making that perfectly clear.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I think it is already perfectly clear; I think the bill is in good shape, and I do not think the Senator will improve it by the language which he proposes. I hope the amendment may be defeated.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me state that it is not clear. Let me read from another portion of the bill, to which I have prepared another amendment, where most distinctly it applies to men who have not been discharged. Beginning at the bottom of page 3, section 3, the bill reads as follows:

SEC. 3. That the courses of vocational rehabilitation provided for under this act shall, as far as practicable and under such conditions as the board may prescribe, be made available without cost for instruction for the benefit of any person who is disabled under circumstances entitling him, after discharge from the military or naval forces of the United States, to compensation under Article III of said act—

If a soldier has been disabled under circumstances and in such a way as to entitle him after discharge to compensation, this act applies to him, although he may not have been discharged.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If the amendment which has just been proposed be adopted, then I take it that the medical board operating in the hospitals would have no authority to request cooperation of this vocational board, and it would deprive the hospitals of the benefit of the aid of the persons employed and working under this vocational board. It therefore strikes me that the amendment which the Senator from New York suggests would militate against the very thing which he has in mind as being desirable.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the Senator will read section 6 of the bill, I think he will find that the War Department would have the right to ask the assistance and counsel of outside help in training in the military hospitals.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I must say, then, if that be so, and if we are going to permit that to remain, I do not see the purpose of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have explained the purpose of the amendment just as clearly as I could, but, at the risk of boring the Senate to death, I will do it again.

It has been stated over and over again by the supporters of this bill that it is intended to apply only to men who have been discharged from the military service, but it is not so confined.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Just a moment. The language is perfectly plain as it is written in the bill to-day. It does apply to men who have been disabled, but not discharged.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I think the Senator from New York has probably misunderstood the interpretation placed upon it. So far as the authority to control is concerned, it applies only to men after discharge, but so far as furnishing the means for rehabilitation and vocational education is concerned while the disabled soldier is in the hospital, the bill does apply by furnishing the facilities to aid the hospital authorities in carrying on the work. However, the authority of this board does not attach until after the discharge of the soldier.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] to the fact that these means are not available at all, except as the soldier follows the prescribed course of instruction, and so unless the board has the power to prescribe the course of instruction in the hospital the soldier could not have the benefit of the act.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think the Senator from Wisconsin is right in interpreting that as requiring the voluntary act on the part of the soldier.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, my purpose in offering this amendment, as I before stated, is to make this matter perfectly clear. If any Senator can say that the amendment which I have suggested does any harm to this bill, I wish he would say it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It may not do any harm, provided the other language of the bill is retained, but to strike out the language which the Senator wishes to strike out would be striking out language which is in harmony with the other provisions of the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, Mr. President, I have not suggested the striking out of any language which would deprive any soldier in the United States of educational training. I am only proposing to change the language so as to make it perfectly clear that the educational training to be given by this board shall follow the principle laid down by the Senator from Georgia and be applicable only to men after they have left the Army; that is all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The words "and who, after his discharge, in the opinion of the board, is unable to carry on a gainful occupation," on page 2, carry their meaning.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; Mr. President, that is on page 2, but the connecting section——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is the first place designating the special authority for action.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desire to reply to the Senator from Georgia. What possible harm would it do to substitute, as I have suggested, the words "is disabled" for the language "has been discharged"—if that is what the Senator wants?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am sure it could not do any possible good.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Well, the Senator and I differ upon that question. At the bottom of page 3 it certainly makes a difference. Now, I invite the Senator to read the language in the beginning of section 3.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was just looking at the language in section 3, and I am not sure that the word "discharged" might not with propriety be added there.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not added, but substituted for "disabled."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. It seems to me, coming back to section 2, that the language of section 2 is much more to the advantage of the soldier than the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York. I am looking at it from the standpoint of the soldier.

Mr. WADSWORTH. So am I.

Mr. NELSON. While the soldier is in the service he continues to draw his pay as a soldier until he is discharged, and if during that period he can get some vocational training, why should he not get it? Why should he have to wait until after he is discharged?

Mr. WADSWORTH. He will not have to wait.

Mr. NELSON. That is the effect of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I decline to be misunderstood in that way. I want the Senator from Minnesota clearly to understand that I am in favor of vocational training of these men, and furthermore, I am convinced—and I have it on the highest authority—that the vocational training must commence in the hospitals. But the Senator from Georgia time and time again has said that this bill does not take effect upon a soldier until after he has been discharged. I want that thoroughly understood.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I said——

Mr. NELSON. I am not predicating what I said to the Senator from New York upon what the Senator from Georgia has said; I am predicating it upon the language of the bill, and I say the Senator's amendment as he has proposed it to that section is to the disadvantage of the soldier. It is much more for the benefit of the soldier to have the language as it is now in the bill. I do not care what remarks have been made by others; I am predicating what I have to say upon the bill, and the language of the bill is clear that a soldier can receive vocational training before he is mustered out of the service, and so long as he is not mustered out of the service he draws his pay as a soldier in the Army. Why should not a crippled soldier have that little benefit as long as possible?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I regret that this topic should be brought up again. There is not the slightest doubt in my mind, and I do not think there is in the minds of a majority of the Senators, that the Surgeon General of the Army has the right to afford vocational training to wounded men, and he is doing it to-day in trade schools and machine shops. The criticism that has been directed against this bill is that while the Surgeon General has been busy with this work, carrying it on to-day for wounded soldiers just as the Senator from Minnesota wants it done, an outside authority under this bill will be injected into the situation and cause friction. That has been the criticism made against this bill. In reply to that criticism we are told that that is impossible under the bill; that they can not go into the hospitals, that they can not teach these soldiers until they are discharged. All I want is to have that made clear.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further to me?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. What right has the Senator to assume that there will be friction between the Surgeon General's office and the Vocational Educational Board? I ask the Senator why does he assume that there will be friction? Is it because the Surgeon General's office does not want anybody to interfere with them? Have they got on such a high horse that they will not permit any other branch of the Government to cooperate with them? Is that what the Senator means by "friction"?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, let us not attempt to question the motives or the good judgment or the discretion of any branch of the Government—the Surgeon General or anybody else—but, as a matter of good administrative policy, I think the Senator from Minnesota knows that we will at least avoid all danger of friction if we place authority in one hand.

I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], on which he demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], which I transfer to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GERRY. I inquire if the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. GERRY. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. He being absent, I transfer my pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

I also wish to announce that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent on important business.

Mr. REED (after having voted in the negative). I desire to correct the Senator, if I may. I have a pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], but it is a limited pair, limited to an occasion when one of us is out of the city, and I did not understand that the Senator from Michigan was out of the city.

Mr. JONES of Washington. He is not; but he asked me to make that announcement. I did not know the Senator from Missouri was present.

Mr. REED. In view of the fact that the Senator from Michigan, I take it, is relying upon the pair, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I inquire if the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (after having voted in the affirmative). The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], to whom I transferred my pair, having come into the Chamber, I now transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. CURTIS (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to ask if the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. CURTIS. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Georgia to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] and will let my vote stand. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Indiana is absent on official business.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is detained on official business.

I wish also to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is detained on account of illness in his family.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]; and

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS].

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am paired for the day with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD] and vote "yea."

Mr. REED. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 36, as follows:

So Mr. WADSWORTH's amendment was rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Georgia to focus his keen analytical mind on the title of the bill, as well as to the use of certain words throughout the bill, namely, the words "vocational rehabilitation." I will ask the Senator if the words "vocational rehabilitation" express the idea he means to convey? We can all understand "surgical rehabilitation," but "vocational rehabilitation" is a misnomer.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think that means rehabilitation by vocational training.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is not what it says.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We differ about that.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator throughout the bill, in two or three places at least, will find that "vocational training" is mentioned. For instance, on page 5, line 26, the words "vocational training" are found, and the word "training" is used in one or two other places at least in the bill. It seems to me that the language should be "vocational training." We can not rehabilitate a thing that does not exist. We are to teach the soldiers something that they have not known. So we do not rehabilitate them in that regard, and I ask the Senator if it will not be agreeable to him to substitute the word "training" for the word "rehabilitation" wherever it occurs in the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if that were done, I think the proper course would probably be to use the term "for vocational training for rehabilitation and return."

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not think that improves it. I tried to rehabilitate the American merchant marine, because it did not exist. You can not rehabilitate a man into something that he has not possessed at some time previously. I will not make the motion now, but before the bill passes, unless the Senator does that, I will make a motion to strike out the word "rehabilitation" wherever it occurs and substitute the word "training."

Now, Mr. President, I ask that an amendment I suggested a while ago be acted on. I will say, in a very few words, having pretty accurate knowledge as to the proper management of hospitals, as well as the proper management of the sick room, that to authorize, even by implication, any board or any person to invade the hospital or the sick room without the consent of the medical officers in charge would be a very unusual and a very wrongful thing. My amendment simply proposes that no vocational training or teaching shall be undertaken in the hospitals without the explicit authority of the medical officers in charge. I think the Senator from Georgia, however he may feel about "vocational rehabilitation," will agree to the soundness of my amendment, covering as it does that one particular thing.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Has it been reported?

Mr. GALLINGER. It will now be reported.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 10, after the word "withheld," it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, however, That no vocational teaching shall be carried on in any hospital until the medical authorities certify that the condition of the patient is such as to justify such teaching.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I am ready to accept that amendment. I think it is perfectly sound. I have spoken to several other members of the committee, and I think each member of the committee agrees with me in regard to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 4, it is proposed to strike out the word "board" and insert the words "office of the Surgeon General."

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I do not care to lengthen this debate; but I do feel, as a medical man, that a very grave mistake would be made if this work of physical rehabilitation were taken out of the hands of the Surgeon General and put into the hands of any board. From my standpoint, the case has been very clearly stated by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL]. I offer this amendment, the effect of which will be, if adopted, to leave the bill practically as it is, except that all of the functions to be performed under the legislation will be performed directly under the Surgeon General. I offer this first amendment, and, if it is adopted, I have other amendments which will perfect the bill so that it will conform to this amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, this amendment goes to the very bottom of the bill. A vote for it is a vote against the bill. That is practically the situation. Therefore I shall not discuss it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am not entirely clear whether I ought to vote for this amendment or against it, notwithstanding what the Senator from Georgia has said. There seems to be a disposition on the part of certain Senators to charge others who differ from them with being opposed to vocational training.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I did not say that. I said that a vote for this amendment was a vote against the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. That has been substantially said by one or two Senators.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But I did not say it.

Mr. POMERENE. I can submit to unfair criticisms at times, but at other times they go entirely too far. My own judgment about this bill is that it would be very much better if the bill were referred back to the committee, in the light of the criticisms which have been made from the floor, and if, perhaps, out of the abundance of this information, some modifications of the bill were to be made.

Now, let me make this suggestion: The administration of the powers provided for in this bill is referred to the Federal board for vocational education. This board was provided for under a bill that I very much approved, but it was to provide for the vocational training of normal human beings, possessed of normal faculties, possessed of arms, and legs, and eyes, and nose, and mouth, and ears. The board is to be composed of certain Cabinet officials and three other citizens to be appointed. I dare say that if any Senator were appointing those three civilians he would appoint one class of men, if they were to have control of normal human beings; but when we understand that the purpose of the pending bill is to train men who have lost some of their members, it seems to me that we want another type of men to have charge of their instruction. We have many splendid teachers in our public schools to teach the use of normal faculties, but we would not employ those same teachers to go to a school provided for the blind or the deaf or the dumb.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. POMERENE. Pardon me just a minute. We are to deal with these unfortunates who come back from the battle lines, and notwithstanding the criticisms that have been uttered by some Senators against those who are not quite willing to accept all of the provisions of this bill, I think there is not a Member of the Senate who is not in favor of vocational training for these unfortunate soldiers when they come back, and I am willing to go to any length that may be necessary from a financial standpoint to help provide for their future.

Up to date, however, those who are under treatment in the hospitals have been under the charge of skilled surgeons. Why? If a patient's arm is off, surely a surgeon, who knows the human body and knows every bone, muscle, sinew, and nerve, is the proper man to teach that patient how to get control of his physical faculties. I do not say that he alone should have control of the patient, but I am fearful that when we attempt to put the education of these abnormal men—abnormal physically, I mean, because of their crippled condition—under a board which was organized for the training of another class of individuals, we may not be serving to the best purpose the ones whom we wish to serve. That is my view about it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I suppose the Senator recognizes that this is a new undertaking; does he not?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. And we have no class of people skilled in this line of work who are particularly fitted to conduct the work at the present time.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not accept that statement, and I do not accept it for this reason: There are American medical men who have been over on the battle front from the time this war began, studying this proposition. I know of some of them myself.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, it occurs to me that while these medical men may have some learning connected with the uses which may be made of partial members of the human body, yet they have no connection with the business interests of the country which would enable them to know to what uses the soldiers might be put. As I understand, in Canada they are training disabled soldiers in 196 different lines of industry, and it would not do to train all of these people for the same vocation.. Inasmuch as we have no class of people especially equipped to carry on this training, is it not reasonable to suppose that men who are engaged in the vocational training of normal people are better equipped for this purpose than mere medical men?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not know of anybody who has even suggested that all these men should be trained for one vocation. Why should a suggestion of that kind be made here on the floor of the Senate in a sober discussion of a question of this kind?

The thing that is most needed is to teach the patient how to use his muscles, how to use these crippled members; and with all due respect to the other 94 Senators on this floor, I would have more confidence in the ability of the 2 medical Members of this body to teach the patients how to resume the normal use of their members than I would in the ability of the other 94.

This bill in its present form came to this body of the 21st of this month, if I remember the date correctly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But with practically no change except the change which consisted in leaving out the provision that on the action of the Board for Vocational Education these men could be put back into the service and held under discipline. That is the only provision that was stricken from the bill. The balance is simply a change of verbiage; and in its last shape it is simply the perfected bill on which the committee had completed its work.

Mr. POMERENE. I accept the Senator's statement with regard to that, but I do not quite see what was the necessity of presenting this substitute bill. That, however, is neither here nor there. Senators have been very much engaged in other matters, and I know that I have not had the time to study this bill that I should like to devote to it because of my other engagements. It may be that after a further study I would accept it rather than the other; I do not know; but I have been very much impressed with the force of the arguments which have been made by Members here to the effect that to a certain extent, at least, these patients should be under the control of the Medical Department of the War Department. I do not say that they should be entirely under their control, but I think they should be for some time, at least; and it is very important that as early as possible after a partial recovery these patients shall be given the benefit of this training, whatever it is to be, and in such degree as the attending surgeons may say they ought to be permitted to be trained.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I only desire to say that this amendment goes to the very root of the whole question involved. Shall the Surgeon General undertake to handle these soldiers up to the time they are placed in employment? Shall he, without any special training in educational work, without any special study of vocational problems, without a knowledge of the industries of the whole country, and the possibilities of work, have this task intrusted to him, or shall it be intrusted to the Board for Vocational Education?

Mr. LODGE. That is, the alternative is that it shall be intrusted to a board who have no medical knowledge whatever.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No. After the Surgeon General has discharged the soldier, after the medical work has been finished, he then goes to the civilian board.

Now, I only wish to say this: The subject, instead of being new with the introduction of the bill in May, has been actively before the Senate and before the country for the past three months. I have put matter into the RECORD upon the subject; I have called for reports upon it; I have sought to attract the attention of the Senate to it. Dr. Gifford and the Council of National Defense put a substantial amount of work upon it. A committee of which Mr. Roosevelt, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, was a member, put a large amount of work upon it. Trained educators did the same thing. The Red Cross has done so. The representative of the Red Cross came to us and advised us that the successful work had only been done for the soldier when, as soon as possible, he was removed from uniformed control and put under civilian control. The director of the Canadian work came and told us that that was true of Canada and that they conducted their work in that way and had made a success of it in that way. An investigation of the policy of England, France, and Italy disclosed that after trying out the subject they found the greatest good was accomplished by placing the soldier, after he left the hospital, in charge of civilian instructors; and the conclusion brought to us from this broad study of the experience of other countries was that when the soldier left the hospital civilian direction of his preparation again for vocational occupation was best.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if Canada has, in connection with this most excellent work, a board corresponding to the board that is provided for in this bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not entirely, because Canada has not a formally established board for vocational education; but Canada created a board to handle this work. It is not as desirable as ours, I think, because they had to go into it as a task more nearly new to them——

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is sure that a board was established?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am sure that Mr. Kidner so stated. I think they call it a commission.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a board in aid of the work of certain citizens, as I understand it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They call it a commission—a citizens' commission, perhaps, or a civil commission supported by the Government——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to ask a question of the Senator from Georgia. Does he understand that under the amendment pending, and others which are to be offered, as suggested by the Senator from Maryland, after the soldier is discharged and becomes a civilian his vocational training shall still be in the hands of the War Department?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the meaning of the amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is the effect of it.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I think my amendment requires some further explanation. I have a very long amendment, which is practically a series of amendments, which changes the bill quite materially, inasmuch as the effect of these amendments would be to put all of this training or rehabilitation work under the direct supervision of the Surgeon General. These amendments, however, go further than that. They also provide that this training shall be given while the man is still in the Army. I believe that this rehabilitation work should be begun immediately and that is should be continued until the man is discharged. I am very decided in my opposition to a voluntary system of rehabilitation training.

I do not care to go into any extended argument this afternoon, because I feel that the question is quite well understood; but I am decided in my opposition to a voluntary system when it comes to this matter of rehabilitation. I believe that it should be compulsory, and that in order to be successful it must be compulsory.

In this connection I will read what seemed to be a huge joke to the committee, but which I think carries within it the many tragedies which will follow if we do not make this system of rehabilitation compulsory:

> The CHAIRMAN. Suppose in Canada he [the soldier] said, "I do not want the vocational training that you will give me. I do not want to be prepared as you will wish to prepare me. I wish to go home." What do you do with that man?

And the Canadian, Mr. Kidner, said:

> We would say, "Good morning." [Laughter.]
> The CHAIRMAN. "Go home"?
> Mr. KIDNER. Yes.

I think it would be a very great mistake to say to this man who might say, "I do not wish this training," "Good morning; go home. If you prefer to be a pensioner on the Government all the rest of your life, go home; we will have nothing more to do with you."

Personally, I believe in compulsory education. I think that one of the great national failures which has been revealed in this war is our failure to properly train all of our youth for citizenship, both in time of peace and in time of war. I believe that this rehabilitation work should be carried on before the soldier is discharged, and when I say that I feel that I am in agreement with the authorities who have carefully studied this question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question at that point?

Mr. FRANCE. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I entirely agree with the Senator that the treatment ought to be compulsory as long as the soldier is in the military service of the United States and until he is discharged from the Army; but after he becomes a civilian and goes back to his State, how can the system be made compulsory, either under a board or under the Surgeon General's authority, in any other way than by saying that if the man does not take the treatment prescribed he shall forfeit his claim to certain benefits to which he otherwise would be entitled?

Mr. FRANCE. It could not be made compulsory, and I think the issue here is very plain. It is not merely a question as to whether the Surgeon General or the vocational board shall have charge. It is a question as to whether we shall adopt the compulsory or the voluntary plan; and I feel that the compulsory plan is the only one which, particularly under our American conditions, will give us the desired results.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator's idea is that the man shall be kept in the military service and controlled as a soldier?

Mr. FRANCE. Yes; that is my view, and it is a view which I think is shared by the majority of the medical men who have considered this subject.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FRANCE. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Would not the Senator's plan lead to the retention of the soldier in the service indefinitely? It might take years and years before the man was thoroughly rehabilitated, and under the Senator's idea, as I understand it, the soldier ought to remain in the military service in order to have this vocational training, in order to make it compulsory. Is that the Senator's idea?

Mr. FRANCE. My thought is that it would not take such a long time to reconstruct the soldier and to rehabilitate him.

Mr. CUMMINS and Mr. PAGE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield to the Senator from Iowa, who addressed me first.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator think that his amendment fairly presents the view he has just expressed, so that one would vote directly upon the question?

Mr. FRANCE. It does not. I will say to the Senator that my amendment is really part of a long series of amendments. However, I present this fundamental amendment at this time in order to test the views of the Senate upon this subject. The question to be decided, I think, as we vote upon this amendment is a double question: First, shall this work of reconstruction be carried on by medical men or by laymen? Second, shall it be compulsory or shall it be voluntary? Those two questions are involved, I think, in my amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. As the amendment is now presented, if it should be adopted and the other amendments are not agreed to, we would then have the situation in which the War Department, through the Surgeon General, undertakes to train civilians, soldiers after they are discharged. And allow me to ask another question. Is it the Senator's view that the Government shall select the employment for which the disabled soldier is most fit and compel him to follow that employment?

Mr. FRANCE. No; that is not my thought.

Mr. CUMMINS. If training or vocational rehabilitation, if there is such a thing as that, is to be carried on by the Government, if the Government is to establish the course and it is to be compulsory, then, I take it, the Government must determine what that man shall in the future do in order to earn a living. I can not quite understand the scope of the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

Mr. FRANCE. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PAGE. For a question. I should like to ask the Senator if, in his opinion, we could hold a man who has enlisted for the war after the termination of the war for the purpose of vocational education?

Mr. FRANCE. I should think that we might. If it were for his own benefit and for the benefit of the community, I think the Government is under an obligation to take the men who may be disabled in the service of the country and place them in the very best possible position to take up again their duties in civil life.

Mr. PAGE. But did we not enter into a fair contract with these men when they were enlisted in the service that they were to serve during the war? Having made a fair contract with them, ought we not to keep it? We have said that when the war has terminated they should be discharged.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If I may make a suggestion to the Senator, my strong impression is that under the draft act the men can only be drafted for the period of the war, and that their services would terminate automatically with the war. However that may be, I am going to ask, now that I am on my feet, if the Senator from Maryland will permit me, if it is not possible for him to so state the whole series of his amendments or else state what the exact effect upon the bill would be if all the series of amendments were adopted, because a vote on the first one is not quite fair unless we can see the effect of the rest on the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to make an appeal to the Senator from Georgia. The Senator from Maryland has offered one amendment, which is a part of or intimately connected with a series of amendments which he proposes to offer. I ask the Senator from Georgia if he does not think it would be wise to let the bill go over, that those amendments may be printed so that we may see them all at a glance?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I had hoped we could vote on the bill this afternoon. If we vote down the first amendment, the balance of the amendments the Senator from Maryland does not expect to offer. It is simply the issue raised as to whether the Surgeon General's Department and the Army shall have charge or whether it shall be civilian charge.

Mr. GALLINGER. It seems to me it is a vain hope that we will vote on the bill to-night. There are other amendments to be offered, and some of us want to indulge in a little conversation on the bill itself.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate ceases its session to-day it shall take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let it be this way: That at not later than the hour of 6 o'clock p. m. to-day the Senate shall take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. All right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, just a word. A great many Senators are very busily engaged in committee work, and it has been mooted, at least, that we might have one day off, and that would be Saturday. The bill will not be injured by going over until Monday.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I object, Mr. President, to that. I think we ought to go on with the bill and finish it. There is other work to come up on Monday, and, while I regret that we have not gotten through——

Mr. GALLINGER. What other work has the Senator reference to?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield to me? I think he is entitled to the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There are seven Senators on the floor.

Mr. FRANCE. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say that this amendment of the Senator from Maryland goes to the very heart of the bill. The question is whether you are to have the work done under this board or under the Surgeon General, and we can vote on it to-night and dispose of it. When we have disposed of it, if we vote it down, there will be no occasion to consider the other amendments. If we adopt it, then there will be time enough to consider the other amendments.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I had hoped we could give it that direction. I do not think anyone wants to debate this subject further.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Minnesota have asserted that this amendment goes to the very heart of the bill. I will ask the Senator from Maryland a question. I do not know what his amendments are, and I think we ought not to be compelled to vote on an amendment or a series of amendments without knowing what the other amendments are. I ask the Senator from Maryland if he proposes to strike out this language:

> For the preparation of instructors and salaries of instructors, supervisors, and other experts, including necessary traveling expenses, $545,000.

If the Senator does not propose to strike that language out, then it is in the hands of the Surgeon General, and he has the authority to employ these agents and helpers in the administration of the law. So it does not go to the very heart of the bill. It does not destroy the bill, as it has been suggested it would.

Mr. FRANCE. I will say in answer to the Senator from New Hampshire that I do not contemplate striking out those words. The purpose of my amendment is merely to change the authority back to the Surgeon General, and to have the work carried on while the soldier is still in the service before his discharge. Those really are the purposes which will be accomplished if the amendments which I have prepared are adopted. I am perfectly willing to have a test made upon the first amendment, with the understanding, of course, that those who vote for the first amendment will vote to perfect the bill by adopting the subsequent amendments which I shall offer. That is perfectly agreeable to me.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is perfectly fair.

Mr. FRANCE. I do not care to take any further time, because I think probably all Senators understand the subject.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield.

Mr. KING. I do not propose to ask a question, but it is really an appeal to the Senator from Georgia. I listened with great interest to the statement made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. I think he expressed the views of a number of us. I am not satisfied with this bill. I am not satisfied with the lodging of this power in the hands of this civilian board. We are embarking upon a plan, a scheme, an undertaking the magnitude of which few of us fully comprehend. It does not mean this $2,000,000, it means ultimately, with the subsequent legislation which will come, with the coordination of this board perhaps with State activities, the appropriation of millions and tens of millions and possibly hundreds of millions of dollars.

I want to appeal to the Senator from Georgia, who has handled this bill with great skill and with great ability, and who has thrown his whole soul into this matter, to let it go over until Monday. I do not think there ought to be any intolerance. We are all in favor of some broad, comprehensive scheme that will care for those who are wounded and rehabilitate them so far as it can be done for the activities of life. Some of us are deeply interested in it. Our boys are going over. Our relatives are there. Those whom we love are there. There is no opposition to a broad and comprehensive plan that will deal in an effective and proper way with those who are wounded and maimed.

It seems to me that when we are laying down a plan that will be enduring, a plan that is to deal with this question, it ought to be a broad and a comprehensive one. The Senators who have been on the committee have had advantages denied to the rest of us. I am not complaining. They have studied this question for weeks, possibly months. To many of us it is a new proposition. The importance of it we are trying to comprehend, and because we are not as fortunate as they and do not have the information they possess they ought not to challenge our devotion to this important measure because we do not immediately accept the views which they so sincerely and so lucidly present.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I believe the Senate will agree that I am reasonably diligent upon the work of the Senate, yet I had no knowledge that a bill of this kind was being considered until I came into the Senate Chamber and found it was before the Senate for consideration. That may not be a tribute to my intelligence or my careful watchfullness over legislation in this body, but it is the fact. Then, when I found the bill was being considered, I took it and made a little study of it.

Mr. KING. If the Senator from Maryland will still pardon me, and I thank him for his courtesy, I am not satisfied with the bill in its present form, and I am not satisfied exactly with the suggestion made by the Senator from Maryland. I was in hopes that with the benefit which all of us I am sure have derived from the debate to-day, further opportunity for reflection upon the part of Senators would be provocative of good and would result possibly in a bill that would meet the desires and the demands and views of all, and possibly be an improvement upon the one which is now before us for consideration.

If there was hostility to the bill, to the plan in general, if there was factious opposition to it, then there would be perhaps some excuse for the driving power and insistence of my distinguished friend from Georgia. But I beg of him to let the matter go over until Monday and give us further opportunity to read the testimony and to digest the suggestions which have been made with a view to agreeing upon some measure which will meet the demands of all.

I thank the Senator from Maryland for his courtesy.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator from Maryland permit me.

Mr. FRANCE. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will suggest another reason why the bill ought to go over to-night. The Senate ought to have an executive session. It is now a quarter after 5.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I agree that it shall go over until to-morrow.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Maryland, if I may be permitted to interrupt, is perfectly willing to have a vote on his amendment. It seems that every Senator here understands it fully. I do not see why we can not vote upon it.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I may say that I would prefer, of course, to have the consideration of this measure go over. I find myself in entire agreement with the remarks just made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. I think I am in entire sympathy with the purposes which the Senator from Georgia has in mind. In fact, for a long time I have been very deeply interested in his wonderful work for the promotion of vocational education in this country.

I feel, however, that a mistake is being made in this particular legislation. I find that my very brief remarks already have been somewhat misunderstood. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] asked me what I meant by the compulsory system. It would take me some time to go into that fully. I mean simply that the man while in the service of the country will be compelled to take some form of rehabilitation treatment which will be compulsory in the same sense that his medical or surgical treatment is compulsory. I could make that perhaps more clear by going into specific cases which I myself have seen in the base hospitals which I have visited. I could explain, by going into particular cases, exactly what I mean by the compulsory system of training. It does not mean that a man will be compelled to take training in some particular vocation, but that he will be compelled to take rehabilitation training of some kind. There is no opposition on the part of the men, I may say, to taking that training. They eagerly welcome it. The cases which have been presented this afternoon do not clearly represent the condition. There are patients who are compelled to remain in hospital and in bed for months. Take a patient, for example, whose two lower extremities have been burned or where there has been a compound fracture. That necessarily compels his confinement for a long time. While that man is in bed, he can be trained not only in telegraphy and typewriting and stenography, but he can also be trained for a profession, the study of which may have been interrupted when he went into the service.

Mr. WADSWORTH. On that very point, may I remind the Senator that there is a soldier now in the Walter Reed Hospital who lost both legs back of the line in France last October. The man is still in the hospital and undergoing a course of treatment and is studying chemistry. His course in chemistry was commenced at the University of Verdun before he enlisted in the service. That illustrates exactly what the Senator is bringing out. He is doing it under the auspices of the Surgeon General.

Mr. FRANCE. I will say to the Senator from Georgia I do not feel that we are in opposition at all as we consider this measure, but I think the whole plan which we are contemplating for physical and vocational rehabilitation should be vastly enlarged. Of course, my chief dissatisfaction with this plan is that it is not big enough to fit the case. I have stood here day after day until I was almost ashamed to stand on the floor of the Senate and pleaded for the organization of this Nation for war. We can not win this war with an Army alone. Why can we not have the scales struck from our eyes, so that we may see this mighty task in all its proportions?

Mr. President, it is absurd to take a man who has been crippled at the front and rehabilitate him and not take the man who has been crippled by falling from the hull of a ship where he is riveting. If his fall results in a permanent disability we should take him also and reconstruct him. Of course that can not be done under this plan. We need a large plan for the prosecution of this war. We should have the shipbuilders drafted into the Army as the shipbuilders' corps, and when those men meet with an accident by which they become permanently disabled they should be taken out and rehabilitated and reconstructed. It is now just as much a military operation to shovel coal out of a mine as it is to shovel it into the boiler of a man-of-war.

I hope the Senator from Georgia will let the matter go over in order that we may consider this whole question from the standpoint of adopting a more comprehensive plan than that which is now under consideration, a plan which would make it possible for us to reconstruct those injured in industries as we are trying to reconstruct those injured at the front. I also feel that the insurance feature should be extended to men not engaged in strictly military operations, but in such work as the iron and steel industries, in riveting ships, and in the manufacture of munitions.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator whether he will yield to me, in order that I may move an executive session?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield, with pleasure.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

On a division the motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products," in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution (14) providing for the printing of 16,500 copies of the proceedings in Congress, together with the proceedings at the unveiling in Statuary Hall, upon the acceptance of the statue of Sequoyah, presented by the State of Oklahoma, etc., in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution (43) providing for the printing of 1,500 copies of the Journal of the Fifty-second National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic for the year 1918, etc., in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 11945. An act to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products," was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

STATUE OF SEQUOYAH.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

House concurrent resolution 14.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound the proceedings in Congress, together with the proceedings at the unveiling in Statuary Hall, upon the acceptance of the statue of Sequoyah, presented by the State of Oklahoma, 16,500 copies, of which 5,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 copies shall be for the use and distribution of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Oklahoma.

The Joint Committee on Printing is hereby authorized to have the copy prepared for the Public Printer, who shall procure suitable copper-process plates to be bound with the proceedings.

GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

House concurrent resolution 43.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there shall be printed as a House document 1,500 copies of the Journal of the Fifty-second National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic for the year 1918, not to exceed $1,700 in cost, with illustrations, 1,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the House and 500 for the use of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, May 25, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 24, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, we thank Thee for that desire Thou hast placed in the heart of man which is ever moving him onward and upward toward a betterment of his condition, physically, mentally, morally, spiritually; for every honest, patriotic, philanthropic, religious endeavor in the heart, the home, society, and in the Nation, looking to that end; and we most earnestly pray that it may continue until we all come unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ; and Thine be the praise forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PROTECTING INSECT-DESTROYING BIRDS.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes in order to make an announcement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes in order to make an announcement. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, the members of the Committee on Rules, as well as other Members of the House, have been receiving a great many letters concerning what is known as the "enabling act," intended to make effective the treaty between the Government of the United States and Canada for the purpose of protecting insect-destroying birds. On yesterday I think I received over 50 letters on the subject. I make it a rule to answer every letter received from a reputable person, and I thought it might save the time of the Committee on Rules and save other Members of the House some labor if the announcement were made that at a recent meeting of the Committee on Rules it was agreed that whenever the business of the House permits a special rule will be reported providing for the consideration of this measure and giving the House an opportunity to vote on it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman know who is conducting the propaganda to which he refers?

Mr. POU. I will say that a great many reputable organizations appear to be deeply interested in it.

Mr. MONDELL. It is like all of these propagandas. They undoubtedly originate at one source, and they send the requests to well-meaning but uninformed folks, and they pass it on.

Mr. POU. I will say to the gentleman that perhaps 10 days ago some of the greatest bird specialists in the country, perhaps in the world, were down here, and I had quite an interesting conference with them; and I will say, speaking for myself, that I became convinced that it is a genuine conservation measure. Some of these gentlemen were totally disinterested, except from the standpoint of the public interest, and they gave me quite a good deal of interesting information that was entirely new to me. But my purpose in making this announcement was to save somebody possibly some work in answering these innumerable letters that are coming every day.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. I do.

Mr. KINCHELOE. My attention has been called to this measure quite a great deal in the last 18 months. As I understood it, at the last session of Congress, when this bill was up, there was a conflict between the Audubon Society and the various game wardens throughout the United States; but my understanding is now—and I get it from the game wardens of my States and from members of the Foreign Affairs Committee—that this agreement has been made, and that it is satisfactory to both sides, and that they are both in favor of it.

Mr. POU. That is my information. I think that is true.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message fram the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4554. An act for the sale of isolated tracts of the public domain in Minnesota; and

S. 4555. An act to validate certain public-land entries.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 4482) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended, had requested a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, and Mr. SMOOT as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 11185) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

RENT PROFITEERING IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the conferees have agreed upon a report concerning Senate joint resolution 152, known as the Saulsbury rent resolution. I desire to ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. Has it been printed?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It has not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report on the Saulsbury profiteering resolution, the rule to print to the contrary notwithstanding. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. I would like to ask the gentleman why this should not go through the regular custom and be printed?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The reason for the request is that a great many people have leases that will expire on the last day of this month, and as the resolution protects those who have leases it is desired that the resolution should become law by that time.

Mr. GILLETT. It would make a difference of one day. It seems to me it is a matter of sufficient importance for the House to know if there has been any special change made in it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The only material change is that the conferees have agreed to an extension of the time until the war is over. When the Senate passed the resolution it provided that its operation should cease at the expiration of the present session of Congress. The House amended it, extending the time until one year after the war shall be over. The conferees have eliminated the provision as to the one year after the war is over.

Mr. GILLETT. Is that the only change?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There is one change as to verbiage only.

Mr. GILLETT. Can the gentleman explain what that change is?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. On page 1, line 6, of the engrossed bill, after the word "agreement," we strike out the words "or written" and insert in lieu thereof the word "of," so that it would read "agreement of lease."

Mr. GILLETT. Leaving out the word "written"?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Is that all the differences there were?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. I had a conversation with the gentleman, as he will remember. Was anything done about that?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman that I took up the matter about which he and I talked, and the Senate conferees opposed the injection of any new matter whatever into it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. As I understand it, as to any lease which is now in existence the lessee may continue until the war is over to pay the rent under the lease, notwithstanding the expiration, until the proclamation is made of the cessation of the war.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is it. There is a provision that was inserted by the conferees that it should continue until the war was over, unless in the meantime Congress should pass a law directing otherwise. That would follow anyhow, and I do not think it is material.

Mr. GILLETT. If those are the only changes, I have personally no desire to see them in print. I shall have no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Those are the only changes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then, Mr. Speaker, objection having been made, I present the conference report to be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. It will be printed under the rule.

INSURANCE.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 4482) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. The House amended the Senate bill, and the Senate disagreed to the House amendment and asked for a conference.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman want to insist on the House amendments?

The SPEAKER. The Chair rather thinks so.

Mr. MADDEN. That ought to be included in the motion.

Mr. SIMS. Of course my motion is to insist on the House amendment and agree to the conference asked.

Mr. MADDEN. Unless the gentleman does that there is no need for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks to take this bill from the Speaker's table, insist on the House amendments to the Senate bill, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. SIMS, Mr. RAYBURN, and Mr. ESCH.

PENSIONS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUSSELL. Under the rules this is pension day. I understand the regular order has been displaced by a special rule. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that on the completion of the oil-leasing bill now before the House the pension bills on the Private Calendar be in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the proceedings on the oil bill various pension bills on the Private Calendar be taken up for consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what would be the objection to the gentleman waiting until next Friday? We have several pension conferences in progress, and I understand this is likely to be the last omnibus pension bill at this session, probably.

Mr. RUSSELL. Next Friday will not be pension day. It will be two weeks from to-day before there will be another pension day, and that will not leave very much time for the Senate to pass the bill and for the bill to get through conference, provided we should adjourn here within the next six weeks.

Mr. MADDEN. What was that the gentleman said about adjournment?

Mr. RUSSELL. I said in case we should adjourn in six weeks, which some people think we may do.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

JOURNAL OF THE GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a privileged resolution, which I would like to have considered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 43 (H. Rept. No. 599).

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there shall be printed as a House document 1,500 copies of the Journal of the Fifty-second National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic for the year 1918, not to exceed $1,700 in cost, with illustrations, 1,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the House and 500 for the use of the Senate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understand this resolution is to authorize and direct the printing of the proceedings of the Grand Army of the Republic encampment?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Has it been the custom to print those proceedings in past years?

Mr. BARNHART. It has.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is an annual proceeding, is it not?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes. It really ought to be provided for in the appropriation bill, the same as the printing of the proceedings of the annual meeting of the Daughters of the American Revolution is provided for, but the Committee on Appropriations have never seen fit to carry it, and so each year we are compelled to introduce it here and put it through.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PENSIONS.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, if it is in order, I desire to withdraw the objection I interposed to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL[.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his objection. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri whether or not this is the last pension bill he proposes to offer from his committee at this session of Congress?

Mr. RUSSELL. That is my understanding. The chairman of the committee [Mr. SHERWOOD] is here, and it is not the purpose of the committee to report another omnibus pension bill at this session.

Mr. GARNER. At this session?

Mr. RUSSELL. The chairman tells me that is his understanding, and it is my understanding.

Mr. STEENERSON. Why should the consent be limited to pension bills? Why not include the whole Private Calendar?

Mr. RUSSELL. This is pension day under the rule, so I just asked to preserve the regular order under the rule.

Mr. STEENERSON. When we get through with the pension bills there might be some other private bills——

Mr. RUSSELL. That is a matter for anybody interested to suggest. This is pension day, and I only wanted to preserve the order for pensions.

Mr. STEENERSON. I suggest that it include the whole Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Missouri yield to me to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield for a question.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] desires to know whether this is the last pension bill to be reported at this session of Congress. Does the gentleman from Texas have any information as to how long a period his suggestion is likely to cover.

Mr. GARNER. I have no definite information at this moment.

Mr. MONDELL. As the session may run until the snow flies——

Mr. MADDEN. We will have time to cool off in that event.

Mr. MONDELL. If certain legislation that has been suggested is brought in, does not the gentleman's request cover a good deal of time.

Mr. GARNER. I merely wanted to know whether there was to be another bill this session, and I was trying to get that information.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have had notice from the Senate that they would take up no pension legislation after the last of May. This is the last of May, and if another bill should be reported it would not be passed, and that ought to settle that question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is the Senate running this body and this Pension Committee? Have we got to follow edicts that are passed down by some one else in that body.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Not at all.

Mr. WALSH. Then I do not think the gentleman, as chairman of that great committee——

Mr. SHERWOOD. If we were to pass any more bills, it would be a useless task, for they would be killed in the Senate.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PROCEEDINGS AT UNVEILING OF STATUE OF SEQUOYAH.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I submit herewith a privileged resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 14 (H. Rept. No. 598).

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound the proceedings in Congress, together with the proceedings at the unveiling in Statuary Hall, upon the acceptance of the statue of Sequoyah, presented by the State of Oklahoma, 16,500 copies, of which 5,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 copies shall be for the use and distribution of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Oklahoma.

The Joint Committee on Printing is hereby authorized to have the copy prepared for the Public Printer, who shall procure suitable copper-process plates to be bound with the proceedings.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. What will be the cost of this edition?

Mr. BARNHART. Five thousand dollars.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not think, in view of the great demand upon the Treasury for matters intimately related to our war program, that measures such as this might properly be deferred until a little later? It would be just as interesting to read when the war is over, and these are matters which I think——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order on the resolution.

Mr. WALSH (continuing). Might properly be delayed. Has the gentleman given any consideration to the matter of deferring expenditures such as this?

Mr. BARNHART. Oh, yes; the gentleman has given much consideration to it. The unveiling of this statue occurred on June 5 last, almost a year ago. It is customary under these conditions to print the proceedings. Sequoyah was a celebrated Indian educator and author of the Indian-language dictionary.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but he is not helping much to win this war.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Sequoyah is dead, is he not?

Mr. BARNHART. That is the general understanding.

Mr. MADDEN. And we are going to spend $5,000 to perpetuate his memory.

Mr. BARNHART. Oh, no. We have already expended more than that to perpetuate his memory. This is printing the report of how it was done.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, telling the story of the perpetuation. A short time ago we had a special committee appointed to investigate the tragedy that occurred at East St. Louis, Ill. In response to a question I asked of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] whether or not the evidence taken in that investigation would be permitted to be published, he said he would not favor, as chairman of the committee, the passage of a resolution asking for the publication of that evidence, which, I think, is of vastly more importance than the story of the life of Sequoyah, because it deals with present-day conditions, about which we ought to be able to get information that will enable us to apply a remedy. The victims at East St. Louis are dead, but still there are a great many people in the United States who ought to be told the facts in the case, so that the proper authorities may be in possession of information that will enable the enactment of laws or the execution of laws already enacted to prevent, if possible, a recurrence of conditions such as those to investigate which the special committee was appointed. I want the story told, and I would ask the gentleman whether or not he still adheres to his position not to publish the evidence in the case of the East St. Louis riots.

Mr. BARNHART. That would depend upon the extent of the evidence. If it is as voluminous as some of the investigations, costing as much as $65,000 or $70,000, I think I would not be in favor of publishing it.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand the investigation as to what the cost would be indicates that it would amount to about $5,000. Suppose the gentleman could be furnished with information that would indicate that it would not cost more than $5,000, would he still object to the publication of the evidence?

Mr. BARNHART. I do not think the committee would object to submitting the matter to the House, but my recollection is that when I asked the gentleman if it would cost $50,000 he said he did not know, and I said then if it would that I should not favor it.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not recall the gentleman's asking any such question, but assuming he did, I did ask him whether he would be in favor of reporting the resolution, and he said he would not, he would be opposed to this resolution and would not report it from his committee. Does the gentleman recollect that?

Mr. BARNHART. My recollection now is that I did say something of the kind to the gentleman from Illinois, but I do not specifically recall. There was something said in the conversation about the enormous cost of this publication, as the committee had been there for months taking evidence, and it would probably be as voluminous as the evidence of the Industrial Relations Committee report, which was so large that it cost the Government something like $100,000 to print it, and scarcely no one took it out, and much of it is lying about the storage rooms, to the credit of Members, unused.

Mr. MADDEN. If I may be permitted one further suggestion——

Mr. BARNHART. And I said further to the gentleman that the committee as such had had no requests for these reports, nothing of the kind had come to the committee, and that until something of that kind should come the chairman of the committee would not be in favor of reporting out a resolution of that kind. On the other hand, the committee is besieged every day for this publication.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, the gentleman will not deny I have submitted to him as to what his attitude would be more than once.

Mr. BARNHART. Oh, certainly not; for the gentleman from Illinois is a stickler for that publication. He is earnest about it and wants the publication; there is no question in the minds of the committee as to that; but nobody else has said anything about it.

Mr. MADDEN. Except the gentleman from Indiana, who declared he would not favor the publication.

Mr. BARNHART. Well, substantially so; yes——

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield to me for five minutes to oppose this resolution?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Massachusetts both that the gentleman from Wisconsin said he wanted to make a point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserved a point of order.

The SPEAKER. Better have the point of order disposed of before wasting a lot of time in debate.

Mr. STAFFORD. Before I press the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct an inquiry directly as to the resolution under inquiry to determine whether I desire to press it or not. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether in such resolutions providing for printing of memorials it has been customary to allot a certain number to the Representatives and Senators of the State which donates the memorial?

Mr. BARNHART. Always so in reference to biographies of deceased Members and in the proceedings in Statuary Hall. Each State is entitled to two statues in Statuary Hall, and at the unveiling of those statues it has always been customary to have residents of the State present and participate in the proceedings, and inasmuch as these statues are particularly interesting to people of the States which place them, it has always been customary—I do not know whether it is the rule or not, but it has been the custom—to allot to the Members from those States a larger number of these publications than to those from other States.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the number prescribed in this resolution the customary number that is usually accorded to Members from the States?

Mr. BARNHART. It is the same proportion that is always allotted.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. My point of order was going to be that it is not privileged under the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. Oh, every time they dedicate one of these things——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to press the point of order, but I insist the point of order would be good. When a resolution of this character is presented to the House wherever the resolution provides certain copies of the memorial for the special use of certain Members of the House and Senate, it does not come within the rule of the House making a resolution from the Committee on Printing privileged, limits resolutions to matters referred to them for printing for the use of the House or of the two Houses. I do not intend to press the point of order and have suggested it, and I am simply directing the attention of the Chair to the fact that if this were a privileged resolution, then resolutions brought in by the Committee on Printing authorizing printing of documents for the use of one or all Members of a delegation would be privileged. The mere fact that this singles out 1,500 copies for the use of Members from the State of Oklahoma takes away its privilege. I do not intend to press the point of order. I rose to inquire what the practice was in such instances.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BARNHART. I have already yielded five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. That is exactly what the Chair was doing.

Mr. FERRIS. I thought the gentleman was being recognized for an hour.

The SPEAKER. Oh, no; the Chair was simply carrying out the wishes of the gentleman from Indiana, who has charge of this resolution.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to renew the point of order, but I am opposed to the passage of this resolution at this particular time, and I submit that the time has come for the House to indicate a little spirit of economy in the transaction of public business. We are just running wild here with appropriations and propositions which have nothing to do with war emergency. Now, I know Sequoyah was a celebrated chief; he invented the Cherokee alphabet, and we ought to do him honor and we have done him honor. We have put his statue out yonder in Statuary Hall, which is sometimes called the Chamber of Horrors, and I think that if this appropriation was to do away with that place, rather than to print proceedings whereby we are seeking to perpetuate it and add to its gloom, it might appeal to the conscience of Members of this House. We are piling up appropriations here by the millions and billions, and we are, I think, very likely to be called upon to pass during this session upon another revenue bill to increase the taxes to be taken from the people of this country, and I believe we ought to put these matters off until the war is over. We can print these books with copper plates then and distribute them to the good people of Oklahoma, and it will be just as interesting reading as it will be to have them distributed this summer and this fall, and they will be just as useful then. This is not a pressing emergency, for the exercises are already a year old, and I submit that we ought to defer this appropriation. It is only $5,000. Of course, it does not amount to very much, but it will be used as a precedent and as an argument for passing other minor appropriations probably before this session adjourns, and I submit we ought to indicate here that we are going to confine the appropriations of funds out of the Public Treasury as closely as we can to matters relating to the prosecution of this war. Therefore I am opposed to this resolution. I am not opposed to doing honor to any distinguished representative of the 48 States in the Union nor to publishing the proceedings where honor is done, and seeing to it that the publications are distributed to the people of those States and that the accounts are perpetuated in the RECORD of the Congress and in the records of the United States Government, but this is a matter that can be deferred just as well as not. It ought not to be urged. We can save $5,000, we can save the time and trouble of the Government Printing Office, and we can utilize the copper that will be required to make these plates and the paper that will be required in publishing the books for other matters that are more intimately associated with the prosecution of the war program.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BARNHART. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 39.

So the resolution was agreed to.

ITALY.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order of the House the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] is entitled to 15 minutes.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, this is the third anniversary of the entry of Italy into the European war. I intend to say a few words about Italy's contribution to the progress of the world. The magnitude of the subject appalls me.

It is not generally appreciated to what extent Italy has been the liberator of thought in the world. The birth of modern Europe, that most glorious period known as the Renaissance, is inseparable from the history of Italy. Mankind had been under an impenetrable shroud of darkness and superstition and ignorance for a thousand years. The intellect of men was being wasted in casuistry, in the realm of the unreal. Nature, man, life, and all the things that enrich life were being scorned. It was Italy that established the first European university. It was Italy that stirred the minds of the European world to action in those spheres of human endeavor where man reaches the divine, where he rises above national limits and to the very heights of the universal. It was she that revealed the treasures of ancient learning. The products of Roman, Greek, Hebrew, and oriental civilizations were put by her at the disposal of all.

Greatness and bigness are not the same thing. The truth is that the highest stages of civilization were reached by peoples when they were small in size. The history of ancient Judea, of Greece, and in modern times of Italy, of England, of the Scandinavian countries, tells the same story. The most glorious stage of English literature was reached when England had a population less than some of our larger States of the Union. And while every nation and every people has enough talent and enough genius to give expression to the distinctive qualities of its own people, it is only to the extent to which a nation produces the universal genius, the man who speaks beyond the boundaries of his own people and to the whole world, that a nation becomes truly great. And in that respect Italy has been among the greatest of nations. Her geniuses have spread their radiance over the entire world. It is to her universities that the youth of France and Germany and Spain and England rushed for inspiration. It was Italian education and Italian learning that gave food to the intellect of the world. She liberated the human mind from the enthrallment of ages. Her people have not sought dominion over other nations and over other lands. It is in the dominion of intellect, of art, of science, of sculpture, and of music that mankind has been cheerfully paying tribute to her.

Because of her geographical situation she early became the educator of the world in commerce. Bills of exchange and modern banks are the product of the intellect and genius of Italy. Centuries ago Italian statesmen advocated the necessity of maintaining friendly intercourse among the nations of the world and disputed the theory that the distress of one nation leads to the prosperity of another.

Italy's treasures are the world's treasures, and the whole world is interested in perpetuating an Italy which should be given free scope to develop her genius.

Unfortunately for mankind it was but during short intervals that the soil of Italy was free from invasion by greater military powers. Even to-day she is fighting for her existence; she is fighting for her life, and all liberty-loving men throughout the world are ready to pledge themselves to aid her in repelling the invader from her territory.

It is to Italy, the liberator of human thought; Italy, the cradle of modern civilization; it is to this Italy, seeking to preserve her own territory and to merge all her people into one great power, which should be a servant of humanity and not an oppressor; it is to this Italy that I am anxious to send a message of encouragement on this momentous day. [Applause.]

EXPLORATION FOR COAL, PHOSPHATE, OIL, GAS, AND SODIUM.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 2812.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 2812, with Mr. DEWALT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2812) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk a joint letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture, suggesting a couple of amendments to section 1 of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

MAY 21, 1918.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. FERRIS: As a result of conferences between members of the Interior Department and Agricultural Department, it appears necessary to recommend that S. 2812, which has been reported out by your committee be amended in two particulars in order to make it clear and consistently workable.

As this bill passed the Senate national-forest lands were excepted from its operation. As reported by your committee, however, national-forest lands and lands in the Grand Canyon and Mount Olympus National Monuments are specifically mentioned as being available for sale or lease of coal. The Department of Agriculture has not heretofore reported on this measure, and the fact that it disposes of national-forest land was inadvertently overlooked in the report of the Department of the Interior. For very many excellent reasons it is considered decidedly unwise to make the sale provision apply to national-forest lands or to lands in the Grand Canyon or Mount Olympus National Monuments. It is therefore recommended that section 2 of the bill, as reported by your committee, be amended by adding to it the following proviso:

"Provided, That this section shall not apply to lands within [national forests or within] the Grand Canyon or Mount Olympus National Monuments."

The foregoing amendment would limit the operation of the act so far as it concerns the reserved lands mentioned to the leasing provisions. Since the national forests and the two national monuments mentioned are administered by the Department of Agriculture, while the administration of the leasing provisions will be under the Department of the Interior, it is considered desirable to have this measure definitely define the jurisdiction of the two departments. This may be accomplished by adding to section 21, page 48, the following:

"Provided further, That before any lease shall be granted under this act within a national forest or the Grand Canyon National Monument or Mount Olympus National Monument, the lessee shall execute such general stipulation for the protection of national-forest interests or national-monument interests as the Secretary of Agriculure may require."

The foregoing proviso is consistent with the present procedure under existing laws regarding rights of way or easements granted by the Department of the Interior over lands administered by the Department of Agriculture. The adoption of the two foregoing amendments is recommended.

Very sincerely, yours,

ALEXANDER S. VOGELSANG,
Acting Secretary of the Interior.
D. F. HOUSTON,
Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I observe that the suggestion is made that these two amendments go in at the beginning of section 2, so I withhold the formal offering of the amendments until section 2 is read. I think I shall offer the first one with slight modifications, although we will leave the latter precisely as it is at the present time.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, what is before the House? Has the first section been read?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] should have offered this. It is an oversight in the printing. It is the gentleman's amendment offered in the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Page 28, line 7, after the word "oil" insert the words "oil shale," and in line 17, same page, after the word "oil," insert the words "oil shale."

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We will accept that amendment.

Mr. RAKER. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will state that, representing as I do the State and county having more oil shale than all the other States combined, we accept that amendment. It is there already.

Mr. RAKER. It belongs there; and after the committee adopted section 28, of course it should go in there.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. RAKER. In a moment. The gentleman from Utah [Mr. MAYS] also states in the committee and elsewhere that he represents a territory that has more oil shale than all the other territory in the world, so that, of course, with these two gentlemen representing that shale I know we are going to get good results out of it.

Mr. MONDELL. I suppose the gentleman under a fair interpretation would agree that the law would apply to oil shale without this amendment?

Mr. RAKER. It is very doubtful. The experts who appeared before the committee thought that it would not, notwithstanding the keen mind of my friend from Wyoming. All those who are interested in this bill should give it consideration. The gentleman from Wyoming having been so busily engaged in the Committee on Appropriations, we deemed it advisable to include this specifically in the bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the House in the Sixty-third Congress reported what is known as H. R. 16136, providing for the leasing of coal lands, oil, gas, phosphates, sodium, and so forth. The bill passed the House on September 21, 1914, and went to the Senate. During the Sixty-fourth Congress the Committee on the Public Lands reported out the bill H. R. 406. That bill passed the House and went to the Senate. During the early days of the Sixty-fifth Congress the Committee on the Public Lands again considered this legislation in regard to leasing, and reported out and placed upon the calendar the bill H. R. 3232. After that time and during the present session of the present Congress the Senate passed the bill S. 2812, which is the bill now before the House, the entire provisions—all after the enacting clause—having been eliminated, and to some extent, or, I might say, in the main, the provisions of the prior bills referred to constitute the amendment and the bill now before the House.

There are several important changes, one relating to permits. Having a lease, the party obtains a prospector's permit; instead of getting a title to the land, he gets a lease upon that land and receives no patent to any land.

We provided in this bill for the disposition of oil shale, it being a very extensive rock in certain Western States, notably Colorado and Utah, and some in Wyoming, as the record shows; and we made more liberal provision for its handling than for the other minerals named in the bill. We also provided for Alaska in regard to oil, the coal lands having been disposed of in Alaska by the coal-leasing bill some two years or more ago.

Then another important feature that has been added is the repealing clause provided for in section 28 of the bill, which protects those who have initiated claims upon the public domain, whether it is in reserved or unreserved lands. Of course the enactment of this bill repeals, unless there is a saving clause as to those who have claims, the law in regard to oil and gas lands. As to coal lands, it is changed by adding a leasing provision, leaving the sale provision as it is now upon the statute books.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. I did not take any time in general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. The provision in regard to coal, I want simply to say, leaves the law remaining as it is. A private individual can get 160 acres upon payment as provided in the statute. An association can get 320 acres upon paying the maximum and minimum price, and an association that has developed the claim and expended $5,000 can get 640 acres under the present law, under appraisement as provided by statute and regulated by the various departments.

This bill permits the leasing of all coal lands within or without the national forests and within the national monuments named, provided there are no prior applicants for the land as coal lands. There has been a good deal said about the law being all wrong and no developments under it, but there is more myth in that than anything else. The public have come to the conclusion that they desire a leasing bill, to dispose of the remaining public domain that contains coal by lease rather than by patent and the surrender of the title of the Government. That is done in a way that protects the lessee and the Government, and permits larger developments, by virtue of allowing a lease to the extent of 2,560 acres, under a royalty that is reasonable and also under reasonable conditions in regard to the working of the mine and the handling of the mine, conditions which prevent monopoly and take care of labor. In other words, the committee believe that the enactment of this law will, to a great extent, develop the coal resources of this country that are so great, and will at the same time supply coal for the country at a time when it is so badly needed.

Conditions are amply provided for in the bill, so that the surface entry may be used for homesteading and otherwise; so, as a matter of fact, we give the highest development to the land that can be given.

The next provision originally in the bill was in regard to potassium. That has been stricken out in the Senate bill and in the House bill, because by reason of an emergency the House passed the act approved October 2, 1917, providing for the exploration and mining of potassium under lease. So, as a matter of fact, we have simply coal, gas, phosphate, oil, and oil shale to provide for in this bill.

The oil provisions are intended to cover the lands in which there is oil or gas. As a matter of fact, from the testimony before the committee, and as a condition existing, practically all the oil lands have been withdrawn and are now within reserves, and are of two classes, namely, those under general withdrawals and those under naval withdrawals known as naval reserves 1, 2, and 3.

The bill takes care of those in the general withdrawals by giving some semblance of relief. It also attempts to provide for those in the Naval Reserve, because of the emergency, and because of the equity, and because of the justice, and practically but one reserve is affected, Reserve No. 2. The question as to remedial legislation that should be provided for those who have gone upon the public domain and have complied with the law, so far as making their application is concerned, has been held up to a great extent. What I say now refers to those who have made their applications, marked their claims, recorded their notice, and proceeded to develop, and in the naval as well as other reserves have actually discovered oil in paying quantities.

Criticism has been made as regards the placer-mining laws, as though the pioneers of the West were not familiar with the law or the application of its use. But, as a matter of fact, no one yet has been able to say that the lode and placer-mining law has not been beneficial to this country; that it has not assisted in developing the State wherein it was applicable and wherein the minerals existed. But a new mineral was discovered, so far as our public lands were concerned, in the way of oil. In order to get a valid claim, out of which even the Government could not defeat you under the placer-mining law, you must have discovered oil. The minerals are discovered by going and breaking a piece of rock off of the ledge and analyzing it, or by going upon the ground and digging a hole, taking out some of the earth, and washing it out in a pan or a horn or any other contrivance with which you can separate the dirt from the precious metal. Then if you posted your notice, put up your stakes, recorded your notice, and then recorded this discovery you got a valid claim provided you did $100 assessment work per year for five years. Then if you applied for a patent you would receive it. But in regard to oil, a man has to expend at least $10,000 before he can discover oil. That is the least amount, and the expenditure may run anywhere from $10,000 up to $500,000. Many of these wells were bored, thousands of dollars were expended in the development. The testimony in one case showed that $450,000 had been expended upon one claim, and they had not even then discovered oil, although they believed they would. But not having discovered it in paying quantity, a reserve was thrown around the land, because the party had not complied with the provisions of the law as to discovering oil in paying quantities, and it was claimed that the Government could take his title from him. Congress came in and relieved those parties, and passed an act which did relieve quite a number.

It gave relief in case of transfers from the original locators down to the man who actually developed. It then passed a further act permitting joint development, so that the best results could be obtained. The whole trouble was evident, because the man had a right to the possession of his claim. One man could get 20 acres; eight men could get 160 acres. They took various locations. They had to expend $100 each year upon the claims, and in addition to that, unless they actually made a discovery, they would lose their claim and no benefit would come from it. The grasper, the man who sits around the town and does nothing, saw the development going on. If a man made a failure, he had no interest. If he made a success of it, of course, then it was his effort to deprive that man of his claim. These practices went on from month to month and from year to year, until the Government took it up in the way of reserves, reserving those particular places where men through their knowledge, skill, ingenuity, and expenditure of millions of dollars determined, by geological examination after the oil had been actually discovered, that there was oil there; and then the reserves were made, the Government holding that the man had not before he made his application actually discovered oil in paying quantities. His claim was invalid, although Congress by supplemental remedial legislation had properly provided for that.

So the question is, What proper relief should be given to those who have given their time, their money, their expenditure in developing this country?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more, and then I shall not take up any further time until we get to another section.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I would be very glad to grant that upon that promise.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, the committee carefully considered this matter, and I want to say frankly now that this report on this particular relief provision is not the judgment of the committee. It is a condition that confronts us and not a theory, however, and it will be submitted to the various departments to see whether the conferees can not come back and present something to the House on that one matter that will bring real relief. So far as the reservation of Naval Reserve No. 2 is concerned, that land, owned by the Southern Pacific and other individuals, land claimed by active claimants, if Members could see that they would see that it is checkerboarded with holes, and to take the land that these people claim would practically be a confiscation of their property and a turning of it over to those who own the private lands, as they would drain the land of the oil that is in it. So far as the Navy using the oil is concerned, it can not use it at the present time and may not for 50 years. While we ought to do all we can to conserve our resources, yet the shortage of oil in all of the Western States because of railroad transportation and the general development, in addition to that which is demanded by the war industries, is such that we should take this reservoir of oil, and the wells in it should be used to the highest capacity, and there never was such a time in the history of this country when it is demanding every ounce of oil in its lands as it does to-day, when, instead of reserving and conserving, we ought to develop it and develop every industry to the highest point of efficiency.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. I would like to ask the gentleman, assuming this bill becomes a law, will it increase the oil we now use known as fuel oil?

Mr. RAKER. Of course, if the President finds in his discretion that it is to the public interest and the provisions of the bill are enacted as they now stand, and these men are then permitted to bore more wells, yes; but the real thing ought to be to charge a royalty against these men who have expended their money and given their time, give them a reasonable part of the land, and let them go ahead. In other words, let them use wells that are bored and drilled to the highest capacity, drill all of the wells they can, and get more oil, to the end that our industries may be kept up and the wheels of progress may go around more rapidly, and that nothing may be retarded during this critical period.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the naval appropriation bill, which comes up to-morrow morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the naval appropriation bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That classified coal lands or deposits of coal belonging to the United States, exclusive of those in Alaska, may, unless an offering, an application for offering, or an application for lease is pending hereunder, be acquired in accordance with the provisions of sections 2347 to 2352, inclusive, of the United States Revised Statutes, and acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, or such lands or deposits may be leased, as hereinafter provided: Provided, That the right to purchase under this section is hereby expressly limited to persons qualified to acquire coal lands under section 2347 of said Revised Statutes. The survey of unsurveyed coal lands, for the purposes of this section, may be procured under sections 2401, 2402, and 2403, Revised Statutes, as amended by act of August 20, 1894.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the section.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, it is not subject to the point of order. Let us have a ruling upon it.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman wants me to make the point of order, I shall do it, and I desire to be heard upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed with the point of order.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, this section as now drawn authorizes the appropriation and sale of lands within the national forests, within the Grand Canyon and the Mount Olympus National Monuments. The jurisdiction of the Committee on the Public Lands is confined to the reporting of bills relating to public lands. The jurisdiction of legislation relating to the national forests and the national monuments has always been in the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. When I get a little further on.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman submit, for the benefit of the Chair, his authorities on that particular proposition?

Mr. ANDERSON. The Committee on Agriculture has always appropriated for and has always legislated in respect to lands in the national forests.

Mr. MONDELL. On the contrary, if the gentleman will permit, the Committee on the Public Lands has full jurisdiction with regard to all of the public lands of the United States, reserved and unreserved, so far as their disposition is concerned, and the Committee on Agriculture and the Agricultural Department have only certain limited jurisdiction with regard to administration.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman is proposing that proposition and, of course, will sustain it if he can. I have a contrary opinion about it. However that may be, the fact still remains that the Committee on the Public Lands can not report a bill covering subject matter that has not been referred to it.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will ask the gentleman to permit me to proceed for a moment. As I understand this bill, and as I am informed by gentlemen in both the Agriculture Department and the Department of the Interior, the Senate bill did not relate to the disposal of lands in the national forests or in these two national monuments. The Committee on the Public Lands is considering and has considered only the Senate bill, and that is the only bill that has been referred to it. That bill did not contain a provision for the disposal of lands in the national forests. Therefore there was no bill before the Committee on the Public Lands proposing or authorizing an appropriation and sale of lands in the national forests, and the rule is well established that where a bill covering a subject has not been referred to the committee the committee has no jurisdiction to report a bill covering that subject.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. ELSTON. Does the gentleman know that the chairman of the committee has submitted two amendments proposing to strike from the operation of this bill the territory comprised in the national forests and the Grand Canyon and the Mount Olympus National Monuments?

Mr. ANDERSON. I wanted to reserve the point of order in order to get an explanation from the chairman of the committee as to what he intended to do, but the chairman of the committee insisted upon the point of order being made, and I made it.

Mr. ELSTON. I suggest to the gentleman——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. FERRIS. It is not subject to the point of order for very well-known reasons.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the point of order is that the Committee on the Public Lands has no jurisdiction over lands in forest reserves and therefore can not legislate touching those lands. The exact contrary is the case. The Committee on the Public Lands has complete jurisdiction over all lands in the United States, including lands in forest reserves and in national monuments, and I will state for the Chair's information, if he is not fully informed on that subject, it is a fact that under the law the Committee on the Public Lands could bring in a bill abolishing all forest reserves; the forest reserves can not be enlarged except by a bill reported out of the Committee on the Public Lands. That is specifically provided in statute law. Not only that, but the Committee on the Public Lands continually legislates touching lands in forest reserves. Not very long ago it passed a bill providing for homesteads in forest reserves, and up to this good hour I have never heard anyone suggest that the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Public Lands is not complete over lands in forest reserves. If the Chair cares to go into the matter he will find the law provides that forest reserves shall not be enlarged, except by act of Congress, by bills reported out of the Committee on the Public Lands. I cite him to the forest-homestead bill reported out of the Committee on the Public Lands. All of the legislation that can be had on the subject must come from this committee. Now, this is true, that for administrative purposes purely the forest reserves were transferred, under a bill which I had the honor to introduce, from the Interior Department to the Agricultural Department. That transfer clearly and definitely was only for administrative purposes. The Committee on the Public Lands provides for rights of way which apply not only to the public lands but to the public forests—for instance, the right-of-way act of 1891, March 4, the right-of-way act of 1901, August 15, if I am accurate in my recollection of the dates—so there can be no question whatever about the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Public Lands over this entire subject, and no other committee has ever attempted at any time to legislate on the disposition of those lands other than for administration.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. ANDERSON. Assuming the Public Lands Committee has jurisdiction of the subject, it can not report a bill or a provision touching the subject matter which is not referred to it, and the question of lands in the national forests and of these two national monuments was not referred to it because they were not in the Senate bill when that bill was referred.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the chairman is familiar with parliamentary practice. He knows perfectly well a bill dealing with coal and coal lands, oil and oil lands—and this bill deals with every acre of public coal land in the United States—when that comes before the committee having jurisdiction of the subject matter it can report legislation of any character with regard to those lands, and in this case the committee saw fit to provide in certain instances for sales and in certain instances for leases. The bill covers the entire subject. It involves and embraces every acre of public land in the public domain everywhere, and the committee is not bound to some provision that may have been in a bill referred to it. But assuming that that were the case, in order to knock the large remaining unstable prop from under the argument of the gentleman from Minnesota, the Senate bill which was referred is a bill to dispose of coal lands of the United States and of parts of the public domain and in an exceedingly liberal way, and the only difference between the Senate bill and the House bill with regard to that matter relates to the character of the legislation.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. In a moment. Section 2 of the Senate bill provides:

That any citizen or any association composed of persons severally qualified by law to enter coal land—

And so forth—

may buy public coal lands at $10 an acre—

And so forth—

any quantity of vacant coal lands of the United States within any State or Territory of the Union not otherwise appropriated by competent authority.

The words "appropriated by competent authority" do not include and never did include the mere withholding of an area for a specific purpose, and even if they did the committee that has jurisdiction over the subject does not have to legislate along lines of the House that originated the legislation. If that were the rule then we might as well adjourn and go out of business and let the Senate do the whole thing. It is true that the Secretary of Agriculture, through an inadvertence, I have no doubt, or misinformation conveyed to him by some subordinate somewhere, did suggest the Senate bill did not refer to lands in forest reserves, but it does refer to them, and it is the most sweeping legislation in regard to those lands that has ever been presented to either of the legislative bodies of this Nation. I now yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a fact that the Committee on Agriculture simply has jurisdiction as to the use of the land?

Mr. MONDELL. The Committee on Agriculture has no jurisdiction over any public land anywhere except for its use and administration.

Mr. RAKER. That is it; the question of title and the disposition of it is in the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. MONDELL. Always.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless some gentleman desires to be heard further the Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, just a word. This is not an appropriation bill. If it was the chairman would properly look with very close scrutiny to all matters of legislation, foreign in character, that might be in the bill. This is a bill having to do with the disposition of Government land, which duty has at all times been reposed in the Committee on the Public Lands. No one has ever attacked it before. Why, the Department of Forestry was only created about a dozen years ago and is merely an offspring and a mere fledgling of the Committee on the Public Lands, and for them now to assert lack of jurisdiction, on a bill dealing with the disposition of coal, oil, gas, and other minerals which are the property of the Government, that has at all times faithfully, undoubtedly, and unquestionably vested in the Public Lands Committee is so preposterous that I dare say the Chair does not want to be bored further with it. I ask for a ruling.

The point raised by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], in brief, is this——

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, if I may have only half a minute I desire to call the Chair's attention to section 4197, volume 4, of Hinds' Precedents, which states:

The forest reserves created by setting aside portions of the public lands are, so far as legislation—distinguished from appropriation—is concerned, within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Public Lands.

And then it gives numerous instances where that jurisdiction has been exercised.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order raised by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], in brief, is this, that as the bill includes national forests and also the Grand Canyon and Mount Olympus National Monuments, therefore the Committee on Public Lands, to which this Senate bill was referred, has no jurisdiction of the subject.

The Chair differs with the gentleman. Whilst it may be true, and undoubtedly is true, that the Committee on Agriculture might have correlative power, it does not have exclusive power over this subject matter. It is also true, apparently, that the Committee on Public Lands has jurisdiction over the forest reserves in so far as executive and legislative functions are concerned, but perhaps not exclusively as to administrative functions. It is also true, as the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] has stated, that he proposes to offer an amendment in the future to exclude these different monuments mentioned, to wit, the Grand Canyon and Mount Olympus, and also the forest reserves. I quote from page 782 of Hinds' Precedents, as follows:

The Committee on Public Lands exercises jurisdiction as to such forest reserves as are created out of the public domain.

Therefore the point of order is overruled.

Mr. FERRIS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment. I think the Chair inadvertently stated that I was going to offer an amendment eliminating the national forests. What I am going to offer is to eliminate the Grand Canyon and Mount Olympus National Monuments, because the law now authorizes the Interior Department to sell coal lands in the forest reserves, and I do not now, without committee consideration, desire to change the law in that respect.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. FERRIS: Page 29, line 11, at the end of the section, insert the following:

"Provided, That this section shall not apply to lands within the Grand Canyon or Mount Olympus National Monuments."

Mr. FERRIS. Now, Mr. Chairman, just a word. The coal lands, according to the law as it now stands, and as it has stood since 1873, and with the amendment of 1907, provides for the sale of coal lands, both within and without the national forests, through the Interior Department. That is the law now. However, as to the Grand Canyon and Mount Olympus National Monuments that was not the law. It was first considered in the committee and then out of the committee and at both ends of the Capitol, and it was not desired to change the present coal-land law one way or the other. Therefore I offer the amendment to strike out the Grand Canyon and Mount Olympus National Monuments, so that the law will remain just exactly as it is now. If it needs attention in the future we can consider it carefully and act intelligently on it.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. Wherein is the law not applicable to the Grand Canyon and Mount Olympus National Monuments, where there is coal land at the present time?

Mr. FERRIS. I am relying on the letter of the Secretary of Agriculture and also on conversations I had with representatives of the Secretary of Agriculture, that in the coal-land laws those national monuments were excluded. And I explained to him very carefully the committee did not desire to change the law in any way, and for that reason I was willing to move to strike those two monuments out. And so far as his request came to repeal the whole land law, as applied to 350,000 acres of forest reserve——

Mr. RAKER. As a matter of fact, though setting aside both of those reserves, the coal-land laws are still applicable?

Mr. FERRIS. I anticipate not. I assume when they were withdrawn from the reserve they were not subject to any entry of any sort. And that is not true of the agricultural reserve.

Mr. RAKER. I desire a few moments on that when you get through.

Mr. CRAMTON. The amendment the gentleman has offered to section 2 has reference solely to the coal lands?

Mr. FERRIS. That is all.

Mr. CRAMTON. Has the gentleman in mind any other monuments in reference to oil, phosphate, oil shale, and so forth?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not think so, because I do not think there is any objection to that. Of course, the drilling of an oil well in a reservation that carries a large area of coal land——

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] allow me? The objection of the Agricultural Department, as I understand, I will say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], was merely to the sale provision for coal, and they have no objection to the leasing provision.

Mr. CRAMTON. Do I understand that the Agricultural Department made objection to the provisions of the bill as written?

Mr. FERRIS. They wrote a joint letter that was handed to me when in the water-power committee meeting, and which I had read at the desk.

Mr. CRAMTON. And the Department of Agriculture has been called on repeatedly for some information prior to this report?

Mr. FERRIS. It was; and after that, and I sent it up, and I thought it was due to the committee to present it when I did. As the law now stands, the Grand Canyon and the Mount Olympus National Monuments are only 2 out of 30 of the national monuments that are under the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture. All of the rest of them are under the Interior Department. These two monuments, as the law now stands, are not subject to coal-sale law, and he hoped we would not make them subject. His second purpose was to repeal the coal-land-sale law, which has now full application to the forest reserves, and strike it out. I do not believe we ought to do that without some committee consideration. This bill has been before Congress for five years and no objection was ever made before.

Mr. ELSTON. Does the gentleman mean to say as to the other 28 national monuments under the jurisdiction of the Interior Department, that the operation of this law goes without restriction? Why should the policy, then, as to national monuments be different under the Agricultural Department than with the 28 under the Interior Department?

Mr. FERRIS. The only reason is they are up here asking it, and you would have a continuation of the controversy that is constantly going on between the Agricultural Department and the Interior Department, practically stepping on each other's toes. This divided jurisdiction has always been very doubtful of propriety and good sense, and any unwarranted jealousy only enhances the doubt.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. Is there not another fairly good reason, and that is the reason why we may accede to the requests of these gentlemen without doing any harm, which is that there is not any coal on either the Grand Canyon or Mount Olympus National Monuments?

Mr. FERRIS. It is a better reason than any other that I know of, and I am willing to take that one. But let me suggest to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] that there are 365,000,000 acres of forest reserve, a tremendous area, in the United States, and that area is being enlarged occasionally. Now, to say, after we passed a great national act here, that because 10 or 12 years ago a certain jurisdiction was slipped from one department to another we should take no intelligent action as to that and even repeal laws that now exist is to say something which, in my judgment, is not the thing to do.

Mr. CRAMTON. What puzzles me is that the committee had this bill before it for exhaustive hearings——

Mr. FERRIS. That is true——

Mr. CRAMTON. And the departments were fully advised, and were given full opportunity to present their views——

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; and the bill passed the House twice before——

Mr. CRAMTON. And now, after it has been pending, they seek to have us make a radical change, although no one outside the chairman understands the scope of it. It seems to me it is asking a great deal on the part of the department to ask that that action be taken.

Mr. FERRIS. The reason I am offering this is to leave the law exactly as it is.

Mr. CRAMTON. If we do not pass the bill, the law will remain as it is as to all provisions?

Mr. FERRIS. Certainly.

Mr. CRAMTON. And it was our desire to bring about legislation?

Mr. FERRIS. Certainly it was.

Mr. CRAMTON. Personally I think we ought to ignore that sort of a request.

Mr. FERRIS. The House can do what it likes, of course. I thought it was my duty to present these amendments to the House and to call them to the attention of the House. I rather think that if we did repeal it as to these two amendments, or strike it out as to these two amendments, and leave the national forests precisely as they are, we will have done no damage. That is all I ask to do.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not want to open up a large subject, but this bill, as I understand it, provides for the leasing of all lands specifically referred to, in oil, phosphate, and so forth, but it includes coal and provides, in addition, for the sale of coal lands?

Mr. FERRIS. No; we leave the law just as it is.

Mr. ANDERSON. But you apply two methods in the case of coal, and you leave the law as it provides for the sale just as it is?

Mr. FERRIS. That is so.

Mr. ANDERSON. So that the two provisions are not treated exactly alike in the bill?

Mr. FERRIS. You mean the coal and the oil?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. That is true.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, I question the advisability of the Congress making exceptions in the handling of these two national monuments any different from the handling of the entire number that have been created.

I know nothing about the coal possibilities of the monument comprising the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, but I am satisfied that the Agricultural Department knows practically nothing about the coal possibilities in the great Mount Olympus National Monument. It may be underlaid with thousands of tons of the most magnificent coal, so far as they know. It is a monument of vast extent and immense possibilities. When it was set aside it had been but little explored and was largely inaccessible at the time it was created. I question the advisability of our making an exception in regard to two national monuments and the handling of the rest in a different manner. I hope that this amendment will not prevail.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, ordinarily I do not want to criticize anybody or anything, but this bill has been before the committee and the House for six years. The committee thoroughly and industriously considered it, and it was one of the purposes of the bill—and no objection was made—that the many millions of acres of land that are in forest reserve should be excluded, so far as oil is concerned, or gas, or potassium, or phosphate, or coal; and at the last minute, without a hearing before the committee, the department asks now that fundamentally the bill be changed and that over half of the territory covered by the bill and over half of the lands that now belong to the Government be excluded from its operations.

No one can raise any objection that it will affect the forest lands to use them for all these purposes. Clearly if there is any coal land in any of these national monuments or in the Forest Service that can be accessible or can be used under this leasing bill, it ought to be used. The very object and purpose is to utilize these minerals and get some use of them. It is said private individuals should be prevented from getting title to them. Now, an attempt is made to legislate, to withhold title, to keep the title in the Government, but at the same time put around them proper regulations and restrictions and lease the land to the man, or the men, or the company, or the corporation that desires this coal for proper use. At the same time it can not injure anyone or affect anyone. When now, at the last minute, this kind of an amendment is introduced, I do not think the committee ought to adopt it.

I want to call your attention to the fact that if, as a matter of fact, the law of sale of coal land does not apply to these monuments, we do not reenact it, do we? Therefore there can not be any objection. That is true. There is no question about it. There are two conditions existing. If, as stated by the gentleman, there is no coal in either of these reserves, then it would not affect the Agriculture Department. But I am willing to say for the sake of argument that there is coal in both of them. We are now enacting a leasing bill, and anyone who is familiar with the forest reserves knows that you can not damage them, you can not injure them, you can not affect them, and you will not in any way destroy the watershed or the trees, or few, if any, by properly developing and taking out the coal that is in those lands, and then reserving and using it. It may be in places close to the towns and railroads. I trust that the committee will not adopt these amendments. Our chairman does not want them, either. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. ANDERSON. To the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma I desire to add after the word "lands" the words "within national forests or."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota to the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. ANDERSON. I desire to be heard on that. I have very great respect for the judgment of the committee and for the gentlemen who compose the Committee on the Public Lands. I think they have accomplished a very good job in reporting this bill as a whole. But I hope that the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] does not wish us to understand that when the Committee on the Public Lands completed the consideration of this bill the sum total of human wisdom had been expended on it, and that no one ought even to make a suggestion as to how it might be amended. I do not know very much about public-land legislation. The gentlemen connected with the Forestry Service, who are somewhat interested in legislation that affects this service, have suggested to me some of the things which would be possible in the operation of this section, which makes lands in the Forest Service subject to appropriation under the coal-land appropriation act.

I want to submit and have read from the Clerk's desk a memorandum prepared and submitted to me this morning by gentlemen in the Forestry Service of the Agricultural Department, which relates to the amendment to the amendment that I have just offered.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

MEMORANDUM.

MAY 21, 1918.

Some of the reasons why coal lands in the national forests should not be sold, but acquisition of coal limited to subsurface rights:

1. The coal-land sale provision enables a purchaser to secure valuable timberland by paying the Government the appraised price placed on the coal only. In this way lands worth $100 an acre for their timber may be acquired by paying the minimum price of $10 per acre for them as coal lands. The Interior Department has never been able to find authority for including the value of the timber in the price placed on the coal land. There are cases of this kind actually pending now.

2. Even if the purchaser were required to pay for both coal and timber in the national forrest, such timber would, of course, be cut under ordinary lumbering methods, and the resulting slash and débris would remain a fire menace to surrounding national-forest timber, a menace beyond Federal authority or control.

3. Such intermingled private land in the national forests where the surface is not actually needed or used for mining purposes would form an unnecessary obstruction to handling forest lands as a unit for any given purpose—grazing, timber sales, protection of city watersheds against pollution, construction of unit improvements, such as roads, trails, telephone lines, fire breaks, and the like.

4. Lands which are already reserved for public purposes, such as timber production or watershed protection, should not be sold under the coal law, for the reason also that the surface, which is valuable for public purposes, is needed only to a very limited extent in coal development and operation, and in many instances not at all.

5. The lands will still have great and permanent surface value for timber production and watershed protection after the coal bodies are exhausted. Their utility for national-forest purposes is permanent. The permanent title should therefore remain in the Government.

(Signed) HENRY S. GRAVES, Forester.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I think it is unfortunate if it is true—and I take the word of the gentlemen of the committee for it—that the matters stated in this memorandum were not presented to the Committee on the Public Lands. But, Mr. Chairman, that is no reason why they should not be presented to this House and considered by the House.

The Forestry Service make no objection to the leasing of coal lands under the provisions of this act. They desire this legislation so far as it does provide for the leasing of coal lands; but it does seem to me that the suggestions presented by this memorandum are very strong reasons why coal lands within the national forests ought not to be sold outright, and without any power on the part of those administering the forest reserves to protect the forest rights in the reserves.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent that I may have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON. All this amendment seeks to do is to reserve these lands from sale, not from lease, so that the Forest Service can preserve the right of the Government and the right of the people, to make best use of the forests in connection with the use of the coal. I think that notwithstanding the fact that the gentlemen on the Committee on the Public Lands say that this proposition has not been considered by them in committee it ought to be adopted by the House.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, the effect of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] is this: At the present time and always there has been a law on our statute books authorizing coal lands to go into private ownership, both in and out of the forest reserves. No one has ever seriously made any effort heretofore to repeal that law. It has been the law of the country for 50 years, since long before the forest reserves were created. When the forest reserves were created that law was not at all changed. Now, without this amendment having been considered by the committee, without either House ever having had an opportunity to consider it, this amendment is slipped in here by which it is sought to repeal that law, and to allow no private ownership whatever of any coal lands within the forest reserves in the United States or Alaska. That is what it amounts to. As a matter of fact probably two-thirds of all the public coal land in the West to-day is within the forest reserves, and, as a matter of fact further, probably two-thirds of all the forest reserves of the West have not one stick of merchantable timber on them. The Legislature of the State of Colorado several years ago memorialized Congress to the effect that two-thirds of all the 14,000,000 acres of forest reserves within my State do not have a particle of timber on them. They might have further memorialized Congress to the effect that on the lands in the forest reserves it requires a thousand years to grow a tree large enough for commercial lumber purposes. So that any talk about timber on a large part of the forest reserves or about reforesting the forest reserves in the mountainous portions of the West is absolutely impracticable and foolish.

It is not only foolish but not in good faith, because anybody that knows anything about it knows the utter impracticability of reforesting mountainous lands in high altitudes of the arid West. Now, they say that the coal lands may sell for $10 an acre. That is just as deceptive as the rest of it. There is no coal land that is being sold for $10 an acre and has not been for 10 years. There has been practically no coal land sold at any other price for years, because the coal land is only sold at the price at which it is appraised, and the department takes mighty good care to see that the land is appraised so high that nobody can buy any of it. That is the policy and the condition of the West, and for that reason it is, practically speaking, an absolute deception for anyone to say that coal lands will be sold for $10 an acre.

All of the five reasons set forth in the memorandum offered by the gentleman are utterly without foundation, and when you attempt to repeal in this manner a great law that has been so long in effect, applying to some 350,000,000 acres of land in the West, it certainly does not accord with my idea of good judgment or frankness. I want to say that there is not a man in this House living west of the Mississippi River that wants an amendment of this kind for his State, and it seems to me the wishes of the people of that country ought to have something to do with determining the question.

Mr. CRAMTON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman rise in opposition to or for the amendment?

Mr. CRAMTON. I rise in opposition to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, section 2 of the bill is really a preservative section, a section which is intended to make it clear that this bill does not repeal, and is not intended to repeal, existing laws for the disposal of coal lands. The balance of the coal sections permit the leasing of coal lands, and there might have been an inference that having provided a leasing method, the method of sale had been repealed, and in order to guard against that possibility section 2 has been put in.

As I understand it, all of the 365,000,000 acres of forest reserve can under existing law be sold under the sections here enumerated for the sale of coal lands. I do not understand that they are being so sold, and I do not understand that there is any particular danger that they will be. It seems, as to these two monuments, by reason of some exception, there is a little change made unless the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma as offered is put in. As to the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota, its effect is not to preserve the existing law but to alter existing law. We have been under that law for a great many years and the national forests have not been sacrificed by reason of it and will not be so sacrificed. The committee had the bill before it a long time, and the department did not see fit to communicate its fears or its wishes to the committee, and I personally feel opposed to putting such amendment in on the floor of the House affecting such an expanse of public lands, and I feel that it ought not to be adopted in this way.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma, the chairman of the committee, is harmless enough. There is not any coal, as far as I am informed, and I am quite confident there is not any in the Grand Canyon or the Mount Olympus National Monuments reservations. So the probability is that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma would have no effect at all. As a matter of grace and acquiescence in the wishes of the Secretary of Agriculture, it might be all right to adopt it if it did not establish a precedent.

There are a good many things in the bill that are not as they ought to be, and the Agricultural Department has made no suggestions. There are many things that a number of us would like to have amended, but they will not be amended, and I do not know why in the eleventh hour, the third time the bill has been considered, the Agricultural Department should suddenly discover that the national forests are greatly jeopardized.

No land containing coal, or supposed to contain coal, can be sold until it is appraised, and the appraised prices are notoriously high, so very high in fact that no one is buying any coal land. There will be very little coal bought under this provision. It is a useful provision, no doubt, because it may enable present operators and future operators to buy a small 40 or 80 acre tract to round out their holdings, but as far as anybody being in a considerable hurry to buy coal land at the present appraised price and open a coal mine it is ridiculous.

Lands containing coal of any commercial value are valued at $40 or $50 to $500 an acre. If there is a little scattered timber on these surfaces, the appraised value is high enough to cover the value of the timber as well as the coal. It is a very excellent thing to continue these provisions of the law in order that they may be utilized in the limited class of cases and under the conditions in which they are likely to be utilized. The national forests are not going to suffer thereby. The probability is there will be very few sales of national-forest lands.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] very properly has been here as spokesman for the Agricultural Department, and he felt that he had a duty to perform in offering this amendment. If the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] is rejected, it will leave the coal-land law precisely as it is now. If my amendment is adopted we also leave the coal-land law precisely as it is now, without any change, and in honor and in justice we ought to do that thing. I have had a very long pull here, and a very great lot of work to do to get a bill out here at all, providing for the leasing of coal lands and leasing of oil lands. The people of the West want title; they do not want any leasing at all, and they do not want to pay the Government anything at all, and it has been a very great task on the part of some of us, and we have had to bare our backs to the whips and scourges of the people in the West who objected to any sort of regulation, any sort of leasing law. They object to anything where the Government has any right at all to supervision over it. Now those who have fought the battles along that line ought not to disrupt here, and ought not to change it. The representatives of the West have very kindly submitted, not so willingly, but have submitted to the leasing law, and we ought not to offer a cure for all the ills at one sitting, but make another bite at the cherry——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Does the gentleman mean to suggest the law is any different in regard to those two monuments you want to——

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; I do, if the gentleman will pardon me. When those two monuments were withdrawn, they of course were reserved from all sorts of entry and sale. Our provision in the bill puts them back in, and we ought to strike it out. This will do no damage, as they do not have any coal in them anyway.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota to the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. FERRIS) there were—ayes 33, noes 8.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Oklahoma offers another amendment?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, the action of the House just taken on the first amendment was in reference to the elimination of forest reserves, and likewise to restore the two monuments; so if the second amendment is inserted it would have no application.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the amendment.

Mr. FERRIS. I was not aware it was offered; it was merely read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to, and upon the petition of any qualified applicant shall, divide any of the coal lands or the deposits of coal, classified and unclassified, owned by the United States outside of the Territory of Alaska, into leasing tracts of 40 acres each, or multiples thereof, and in such form as, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, will permit the most economical mining of the coal in such tracts, but in no case exceeding 2,560 acres in any one leasing tract; and thereafter the Secretary of the Interior shall, in his discretion, from time to time, upon the request of any qualified applicant or on his own motion, offer such lands or deposits of coal for leasing, and, upon a royalty fixed by him in advance, shall award leases thereof through advertisement, by competitive bidding, or, in case of lignite or low-grade coals, such other methods as he may by general regulations adopt, to any qualified applicant: Provided, That no railroad or other common carrier shall be permitted to take or acquire through lease or permit under this act any coal lands or deposits of coal in excess of such area or quantity as may be required and used solely for its own use, and such limitation of use shall be expressed in all leases or permits issued to railroads or common carriers hereunder. That such a railroad or common carrier may be permitted to take under the foregoing provisions not to exceed one lease hereunder upon and for each 200 miles of its line in actual operation. The term "railroad" or "common carrier" as used in this act shall include any company or corporation owning or operating a railroad, whether under a contract, agreement, or lease, and any company or corporation subsidiary or auxiliary thereto, whether directly or indirectly connected with such railroad or common carrier, but shall not include spurs, switches, or branch lines operated by any lessee and necessary to connect the mine with the line or lines of any railroad or other common carrier.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have a letter written by the Commissioner of the General Land Office to Senator UNDERWOOD, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the letter will be read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

GOVERNMENT-OWNED COAL LAND AND COAL DEPOSITS IN ALABAMA.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, May 18, 1918.

Hon. OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Referring to your personal call on the 14th instant, with reference to Government-owned coal lands and coal deposits within the State of Alabama, the act of March 3, 1883 (22 Stat., 487), provides, in part—

"That within the State of Alabama all public lands, whether mineral or otherwise, shall be subject to disposition only as agricultural lands: Provided, however, That all lands which have heretofore been reported to the General Land Office as containing coal and iron shall first be offered at public sale. * * *."

Under the terms of the act cited, public lands in the State of Alabama, which were owned by the Government on the 3d day of March, 1883, were, on and after said date, subject to disposal only as agricultural lands (18 Fed. Rep., 709), regardless of their character as mineral or nonmineral and regardless of whether they did or did not contain coal or iron or coal and iron, with this restriction, however, that as to public lands in said State which had been, prior to said 3d day of March, 1883, reported to the General Land Office as containing coal and iron, they should first be offered at public sale by President's proclamation (3 L. D., 171).

The provisions of the Federal coal-land laws (secs. 2347–2352 R. S., U. S.) ceased to operate within the State of Alabama from and after the passage of said act of March 3, 1883 (6 L. D., 501). Coal lands in said State not within the purview of the proviso above quoted were, after March 3, 1883, subject to disposition only as agricultural lands; but as to the lands within said quoted proviso they could not be sold as agricultural lands unless it first appeared that they had been, after March 3, 1883, by proclamation of the President, offered at public sale.

"The object of the proviso of the act of March 3, 1883, evidently was and is to except from or take out of the operation of the declaration in the act that mineral lands shall thereafter be disposed of as agricultural lands, that class of lands which had previously been reported to and dealt with by the General Land Office as mineral lands, and thus prevent them from falling back into the system applicable to agricultural lands, until they shall first be offered at public sale with a view that the Government might receive the benefit of such enhanced value as may have attached thereto by reason of their having been classed as mineral; but it is also evident that the offering at public sale contemplated by said proviso is a future thing." (Excerpt from 8 L. D., 75.)

I am unable to find that the lands referred to in said above referred to and quoted proviso have ever been put in the market and offered at public sale.

By the act approved March 27, 1906 (34 Stat., 88), it was provided:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to reclassify the public lands of Alabama, so as to determine which of said lands are in fact agricultural lands and which mineral lands, and to decide which of said lands shall be subject to homestead entry, and to that end he is hereby authorized and empowered to employ such expert mineralogist, assayist, and civil engineers as may be necessary to designate and survey said mineral and agricultural lands.

"SEC. 2. That upon receipt of the report of the parties designated to make such classification, all lands designated thereby as agricultural shall be subject to homestead entry as such."

Following the passage of said act of 1906 the Secretary of the Interior reclassified such of the public lands in Alabama as were reported prior to said 3d day of March, 1883, as containing coal and iron, except certain tracts which were erroneously omitted from the list of lands to be reclassified, and on the 17th of August, 1907, transmitted to the register and receiver at Montgomery, Ala., what were designated as schedules "A" and "B," said schedule "A" consisting of a list of those tracts of lands so reported which are now classified as agricultural lands and said schedule "B" consisting of a list of the lands which are now classed as mineral lands and which are unappropriated except by pending homestead entries. Concerning the lands in said schedule "B" it was stated (36 L. D., 109) that "their status is not affected in any manner by the passage of the act of March 27, 1906, nor by the present reclassification. Until said lands shall have been offered for sale, they will not be subject to entry of any kind."

It was stated in the letter to said local land officers that as to the tracts erroneously omitted from the list of lands a supplemental report would be made, and that as to the entries embraced in said schedule "B" which were suspended prior to the act of March 27, 1906, same were to remain suspended pending further action.

Said schedule "B" embraces approximately 68,000 acres of land in the vicinity of the Warrior field as mineral land valuable for coal. A report on a part of this field may be found in United States Geological Survey Bulletin 400, pages 170 to 189, and folio 179. A report on the northern part of the Cahaba coal field east of the Warrior Basin was published in 1906, Bulletin 316, pages 76 to 114. These bulletins may be obtained from the United States Geological Survey.

On the 23d day of April, 1912, it was provided by an act of that date (37 Stat., 90):

"That unreserved public lands containing coal deposits in the State of Alabama which are now being withheld from homestead entry under the provisions of the act (of Mar. 3, 1883) may be entered under the homestead laws of the United States, subject to the provisions, terms, conditions, and limitations prescribed in the act of June 22, 1910" (36 Stat. L., 583).

And in paragraph 5 of the May 24, 1912, circular, in 41 L. D., 32, under said act of April 23, 1912, it is stated that—

"There is at this time no law which provides for the disposition of the coal in these lands.'

It would be impracticable, with the limited force at hand, to give in detail the exact status, by 40-acre tracts, of said approximately 68,000 acres of land. Some of this land, both surface and subsurface, is owned by the Government, while as to other portions thereof the surface has been entered under the homestead law and said act of 1912 with a reservation of the coal deposits to the Government.

The said statement that there is at this time no law which provides for the disposition of the coal in these lands refers to the coal which has been reserved to the Government by homesteaders who have made homestead entries under the homestead law and said act of 1912. One of the provisions of said act of 1910 referred to in said act of 1912 is (sec. 3 of said act of 1910) that "the coal deposits in such lands shall be subject to disposal by the United States in accordance with the provisions of the coal-land laws in force at the time of such disposal," but, as has been heretofore stated, the coal-land laws are not now and have not been since 1883 in force in the State of Alabama, and so the coal deposits reserved by homesteaders to the Federal Government, where their entries are made under the homestead law and said act of 1912, can not be sold under the coal-land law; neither is there any existing law whereby they can be put on the market by presidential proclamation or otherwise, it being obvious that a mere deposit of coal situate in land the surface of which has been disposed of under provisions of laws heretofore mentioned can not be disposed of as agricultural land or as a homestead entry.

As to the land and the coal in the land mentioned in said schedule "B," same may, in any case where there has been no entry thereof under the homestead law and said act of 1912, and where there has been no withdrawal or reservation thereof, be disposed of by proclamation of the President by public sale (42 L. D., 489).

From the foregoing it will be noted that of the 68,000 acres in Alabama of coal land or land in which there are reserved coal deposits the said reserved deposits are not now subject to disposition under any law, and the coal lands for which no surface entries have been made are still controlled by the old act of 1883, as modified by the act of 1912, allowing the disposition of the surface. It is reasonably certain that the language of the proposed leasing bill (S. 2812), or House substitute therefor, will not reach the coal lands on which no surface entries have been made, and it is more or less doubtful whether it will reach the coal deposits in the lands for which surface entries have been made. Manifestly this is an unsatisfactory situation. At any rate, if it is desired to make the general leasing bill applicable to Alabama coal lands and reserved coal deposits, adequate language to that end should be inserted in the leasing bill so that there will be no doubt about it. This could be accomplished by insertion in the bill as reported by the House (H. Rept. 563 on S. 2812), after the words "United States," line 20, page 28, of the words "including the coal land and coal deposits referred to in the acts of March 3, 1883 (22 Stat., 487), March 27, 1906 (34 Stat., 88), and April 23, 1912 (37 Stat., 90).

Very respectfully,

CLAY TALLMAN, Commissioner.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I apologize for having taken the time of the committee to have the opinion read. Those who have followed the reading see that the question involved is a matter relating only to Alabama coal lands owned by the Government. It appears that these lands are held under certain acts which are not generally applicable, which are applicable perhaps only to Alabama, and that the commissioner is of opinion that under this bill, in the form in which we are now considering it, these lands will not be affected by it. Now, it is for the purpose of putting Alabama lands on exactly the same footing as other lands—and undoubtedly the bill was intended to do that—that I have risen. It seems to me we ought to have this bill applicable to all sections of the country. It was evidently intended to be so drawn. The chairman of the committee thinks it does so apply, and I agree with the commissioner that we should not leave any doubt remaining on that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for one minute more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. With a view to correcting this defect, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 2 of the bill, so that I may offer an amendment to incorporate in the statute the words which the commissioner suggests.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

The CHAIRMAN. One moment. Let the Chair state what the request is. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to return to section 2 for the purpose of amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman that placing the amendment that the gentleman suggests at the point suggested—on page 28, line 20, after the words "United States"—if it means anything at all, it disposes of the coal lands in Alabama under the sale provision and not under the leasing provision. And that is not what he wants, is it? He wants to make the coal lands in Alabama subject to lease, does he not?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I want to put the coal lands in Alabama on the same footing as coal lands elsewhere.

Mr. RAKER. In other words, what I am getting at is this: Do you want to put the coal lands of Alabama under lease under this bill?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I want to make the amendment that the commissioner suggests. That is to say, to take away from the bill any doubt that there might be any special situation or condition applying to Alabama that does not apply to other lands. Now, the commissioner does not give any opinion as to the matter of lease, and I will not seek to make any change there.

Mr. RAKER. What I am getting at is this: That by this amendment, if it is intended to make applicable the present coal mining law, you authorize the sale of the Alabama coal lands and not lease them.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. For a question.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it necessary to amend the bill in order to include Alabama? Really I have always thought that Alabama was in the Union, but if it is not we ought to bring it in.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I am reserving the right to object to the request.

Mr. MONDELL. If that is necessary, the amendment should be in the first section. Then all the provisions of the bill will apply.

Mr. RAKER. What I am trying to get at and to call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama and other members of the committee to is, that if the amendment goes in at the point suggested, it might simply make the general coal-land law applicable to Alabama, when, as a matter of fact, his intention is to dispose of the Alabama coal lands under lease.

Mr. MONDELL. But, if it goes in the first section, it covers both.

Mr. RAKER. Absolutely, and it ought not to go into this place.

Mr. CRAMTON. I will object to that request for the reason stated. I think, if the gentleman will put it in line 8, after the word "including" in section 1, he will accomplish what he wants.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will say that I am offering it at the point where the commissioner says it ought to be. He has given the subject careful consideration, and I know that this is his opinion, and I would rather accept that than to take my own opinion offhand.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. FERRIS. I object.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to the gentleman that if he wants to get that amendment in why could he not put it in——

Mr. CRAMTON. Line 8, section 1.

Mr. RAKER. I have got a better place. Section 3, page 29, line 15, after the word "States."

Mr. CRAMTON. That only applies to the leasing. If he puts it in section 1, it will apply to both leasing and sale.

Mr. FERRIS. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Alabama something. There may be something to the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama, but it is very questionable if we ought to accept an amendment of this sort without looking into it. This bill will be in conference, and we could take it up then, and I can go over it with the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I ask unanimous consent that I may have 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, referring for a moment to the matter of these Alabama coal lands, I am somewhat familiar with the legislation that has been refefred to. It was reported while I was a member of the Committee on Public Lands, and I think there is no manner or sort of doubt but that these Alabama coal lands are included within the provisions of this bill. Alabama is a State of the Union, and the public lands in Alabama have no different status from any other public lands that would exempt them from the provisions of this act.

But, Mr. Chairman, I want to discuss for a moment the provisions of this section. Section 3 evidently contemplates the dividing up by the Secretary of the Interior of the public lands into leasing blocks.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. MONDELL. Into such tracts and areas as in his opinion will promote the most economical mining of the coal. I will yield to the gentleman briefly.

Mr. RAKER. That idea of blocks is stricken out of the bill. We do not put the blocks in the bill at all.

Mr. MONDELL. The committee has transformed the blocks into tracts. There is some difference between tweedledee and tweedledum, but there is no difference between blocks and tracts when it comes to a matter of this sort, so that it is a distinction without a difference.

I have discussed this matter several times before the committee, and I have some hesitation about taking up the time of the committee further in discussing it, except in the hope that in the conference, when all these matters will be considered, we may secure a better plan for coal leasing than is provided for in this section. We tried the dividing of the coal lands up into blocks and tracts in Alaska, but without any considerable success. We would have done better if we had said to the prospective lessee: "Go out into these fields, do your own prospecting and developing, and block out an area upon which a mine can be developed; bring us your application; we will examine it, and if you have what seems to be a proper area for an economic mine we will lease it to you."

It has developed that what was done and what is now proposed was not wise as applied to Alaska, but it did not cost us very much, because Alaska's coal areas are small as compared with the coal areas of the country generally. But as applied to the multiplied millions of acres of coal lands of the country generally, this means that a bureau of the Government would be expected to go out on the public domain and spend vast sums of money in dividing the public land up into leaseholds. No one can satisfactorily do the developing work, do the prospecting work necessary for the proper opening of a mine other than the man who himself desires to open the mine. This plan will be expensive and will not be in the public interest, in my opinion.

Further than that, the bill ought to provide for a prospecting permit. The committee wisely provided for a prospecting permit on oil lands. It is even more important that there should be a prospecting permit on coal lands.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. Whether rightly or wrongly, they insist that they know where the coal deposits are. They claim that in drilling they know precisely where the deposits are, and they know of no valid reason why there should be prospecting at all. That was their statement to the committee.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that in one case I personally prospected for two years a certain coal field, and the people with whom I was associated invested something like $90,000 before we had developed the facts necessary to justify the opening and development of a mine. Why, the Government has spent large sums prospecting some of those blocks in Alaska. Of course the coal is there, of varying thickness, dip, depth, and quality; but the determination of the question as to where the vein shall be attacked for successful and economic mining, the question of the areas that are reachable from the entries made—those things can not be determined from any superficial examination in any coal field on earth, save perhaps fields like some parts of Illinois or Pennsylvania, where the vein lies at about an equal distance from the surface everywhere and is exceedingly uniform. On much of the public lands of the United States the character and the thickness of the vein changes rapidly, the dip varies greatly, and a very considerable amount of prospecting is necessary in order to determine where a mine can be economically opened and operated. Among other questions to be determined are those relating to the location of loading tracks, where the necessary housing for the employees may be provided, where transportation facilities may be made available. There are a score of things, all having their bearing on the question of where a vein should be opened or attacked, and the size and location of the area surrounding that opening necessary for the proper development of the mine.

Mr. MADDEN. Is the price made uniform in this leasing bill—for coal, for instance?

Mr. MONDELL. No. The leasing price is not less than 2 cents a ton, and such higher royalty as the Secretary of the Interior may fix; and then, in addition to that, all leases are subject to bidding, and the lease goes to the highest bidder. The longest pole and the thickest and biggest pocketbook gets the persimmon.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. What suggestion has the gentleman now?

Mr. MONDELL. I have offered amendments to remedy the situation on two previous occasions.

Mr. RAKER. Let me finish my question. This bill gives a man extra territory for mills and sites and grounds and rights of way.

Mr. MONDELL. That does not suffice. A man must have the opportunity to go out into the field and find out the thickness and quality of the vein, to learn whether the vein is continuous, to study its dip, and to determine all those things that are necessary, except where the land is lean and unbroken, and the vein is of uniform depth and dip, before he can intelligently open a mine and conduct it with success.

The bill makes no provision for that at all. The gentleman asks me what I would suggest. I have offered amendments here on different occasions affecting that situation, but for some reason or other the committee has not seen fit to adopt them. I still hope that when this bill goes into conference that matter will be given consideration, and that first there will be given a prospecting permit, and following that prospecting permit there shall be a lease granted. I would have a very different provision as to the lease than that contained in this bill.

In my opinion, we shall never have satisfactory coal development under a system that proposes leasing under bids. In the first place, it excludes any man and every man of ordinary means wherever he is in competition with individuals or corporations of great wealth. In certain sections of the State of Colorado no one would have much prospect of opening a coal mine if the Colorado Fuel Co. desired to compete against him under the provisions contained in this bill. In other sections no man of ordinary means could hope to open a coal mine if one of the great corporations operating there saw fit to bid against him. They could bid a cash bonus so high that no man of ordinary means could afford to pay it. When the great bonus is paid, it is a little money in the Treasury, it is true, but the public will pay it back many times over in the increased cost of their fuel.

It is not a wise plan. It was never a part of the plan or purpose of those who originally proposed this kind of legislation. The Secretary of the Interior should be given discretion to impose the amount of royalty that he deems wise under the circumstances, preferably within limits provided by law. And then he should lease the property under conditions that will warrant its economical development. This system of bids and bonuses is a system which will concentrate both coal and oil in the hands of great corporations. This plan does not give the man of ordinary means any chance at all wherever a man of large means or a corporation of large means sees fit to bid against him, and it is not the sort of legislation that we should encourage.

Mr. MADDEN. Has it not always been the policy of the Democratic Party to work against monopolies? And does the gentleman pretend to say that now the Democratic Party are in favor of monopolizing?

Mr. MONDELL. I hope no one intends to encourage monopoly, but it will inevitably lead to monopoly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I ask that the gentleman from Wyoming have one minute more in which to answer a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Wyoming be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is the gentleman from Wyoming on the Committee on the Public Lands?

Mr. MONDELL. No; I am not.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman know what argument was made in favor of that bonus provision?

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman had heard the discussion during general debate yesterday, he would have known that there has been very little discussion of the general provisions of this bill. Most of the discussion has been with regard to certain so-called relief measures, and I think perhaps I am the only one who has discussed these general provisions to any considerable extent. I know of no argument except that the Government may get more money in some cases by exacting a bonus, but it must inevitably lead to concentration and to monopoly and it tends to keep the ordinary small fellow out of the coal and oil business.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I move to strike out the last word, and I should like to ask the gentleman from Wyoming another question. Is this the first time that that provision has been in any bill regulating the disposition of coal lands?

Mr. MONDELL. That provision has been in this particular legislation since it was first introduced. This is the third time that a bill somewhat similar to this has been before the House, and the provision has been in this bill twice as it passed the House and twice I have called attention to the danger in this provision. Some gentlemen came here a short time ago and appeared before the committee and called attention to the danger of monopoly in oil under that kind of a bonus provision, but no one seems to be paying very much attention to the general provisions of the bill as they relate to coal, because there does not seem to be anyone anxious to make a coal lease. This is the plan: The Secretary fixes the minimum royalty, and then he offers the lease to the highest bidder. Now, I assume that that bid must, under the terms of the bill, be in the nature of a bonus. A bidder would say, "I agree to take a lease of a certain described area, paying the royalty fixed and under the conditions prescribed, and in addition to that I will pay $5,000, $10,000, $20,000 or $100,000 for the lease." That is the plan that has been followed somewhat, I understand, in Oklahoma in the sale of Indian oil leases. However successful or unsuccessful it may have been there, it is not sound as a general public policy. The bill authorizes the Secretary to fix any royalty he sees fit, provided it is in excess of 2 cents a ton of 2,000 pounds, and we should provide that the Secretary fix a fair royalty and grant the lease under that royalty. That would give all comers a chance at the lease. But if the lease is to be put up to the highest bidder, the highest bidder is almost certain to be the corporation that is operating in that community. Now, gentlemen may say that the matter is safeguarded because only one lease may be taken under this bill, and therefore that prevents combinations; but the gentleman knows how these things are gotten around. Another corporation or individual, apparently not the one operating the next mine, bids above the ordinary comer and the lease goes to him. We must make up our minds that if we are to adopt this bidding system on oil and coal leases, the ordinary citizen, the man of limited means, is not going to have any opportunity at all.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I think that answers my question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman still has one minute remaining.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will ask one more question.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to say to my friend in just one second of that minute that I do not believe anybody intends to build up monopoly under this bill. Gentlemen are proceeding in good faith. What I do believe is that what they have done will result in the building up of a monopoly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman certainly presents a very strong argument in support of his contention that the people having the most money will make the highest bid and pay the biggest bonus, and therefore will get the lease.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I was just propounding a question to the gentleman from Wyoming. The title of the bill as it left the Senate is—

An act to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

I notice that, on page 28, line 7, the bill is confined to—

Deposits of coal, phosphate, oil, or gas—

And that sodium is omitted. Why was sodium omitted?

Mr. FERRIS. Because we passed a special bill for that, and it became a law.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. When?

Mr. FERRIS. In the last session of this Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I ask that I have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. We passed a special bill, and it is a law.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But it is strange that the Senate had forgotten that, because this bill passed the Senate January 27, 1918.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman from Wisconsin will not hold me responsible for all the omissions of the Senate, I am sure.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No; but it excuses me for forgetting that that bill had been passed. Now, I should like to have the gentleman answer the question that I put to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. FERRIS. All I have to say is that there is a limitation on the area that any bidder can get. No one man or corporation can get more than 2,550 acres, which is a comparatively small area for coal people to operate. Second, they can not transfer a lease without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. Hence, the only monopoly would be to have one of these leases, to work it under the strict surveillance of the Interior Department, and pay the royalty thereon, and pay as much bonus as the business would stand. This is real conservation in the public interest. It is a long step in the right direction. It supplants an old antiquated law that everybody desires to get rid of. It is favorably recommended by all the departments of the Government. It is just as it has twice passed; it is all right. If anything develops later we can look after it in conference; or, still, if we miss anything in conference, the Congress will still be here—they can amend it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is there anything to prevent the great corporations from bidding and making purchases?

Mr. FERRIS. If they make purchases they can not transfer them without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. This is the first time that the Government gets a chance to say you can have but one lease and no more, and you must pay a royalty and submit to such rules and regulations regarding the proper treatment of labor, regarding the proper conduct of mines, regarding the sale of the commodity, as the Government thinks reasonable. The gentleman from Wyoming this year objects to competitive bidding, as he did last year and the year before when the bill was passed. That may or may not be the better way to determine it. Suppose the gentleman from Wyoming, the gentleman from Wisconsin, and myself were each to make application for a given tract at the same time. There must be some method of determining which one shall have the lease, and what way can be so wholesome, what way can be so just, as to let us bid for it in the open market? The gentleman from Wyoming complains that the man who had the money would get the coal land, and the man without the money would not get it. There is some truth in that, but the mining of coal is not a business for the barefoot boy or the barefoot homesteader to engage in. It is a million-dollar job to start with. It is not a question of taking the bread from the penniless homesteader, because he could not mine coal. It is more a question of determining between three or four coal operators, either one of whom is able to pay the royalty in the first place; and in the second place to pay a bonus to determine which one shall have it. This will not blast the Treasury to put a few pennies into it, as distinguished from constantly depleting it.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Has not this been said as an argument in favor of the leasing system—and I think a strong argument—that under the leasing system a man was not required to make a tremendous investment, while under the purchasing system he was; and therefore the man, the ordinary man—I do not mean the barefoot boy or the penniless homesteader, but a man of ordinary means, with energy and ambition, and my friend has seen many a man who had the enterprise and a great deal of energy and ambition to build up—would have an equal opportunity? It has been the hope that the leasing system would give that man a better chance than the system under which he had to pay a very high price for the property in which he invested.

Mr. FERRIS. I fear the gentleman is taking up the whole of my time. The answer to the gentleman's argument is that this one company, this one man, can only have one lease, and no more, and he can not transfer it without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and we have a right to assume that the Secretary of the Interior will not permit dummies or fraudulent transfers and let one company rent it all. This is perfectly safe, perfectly wholesome. It has been approved by everybody.

Now, further, the Bureau of Mines and the Geological Survey and the Secretary of the Interior and every arm of the Government that has had anything to do with the operation of coal lands had to do with the drafting of this, and each and every one recommended it, and everyone asserted that it would kill monopoly, get revenue for the Government, and keep one coal operator from occupying the whole country; and I think with that in mind it ought to be adopted.

This bill passed the House four years ago and two years ago, and we have not changed it one iota. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], and all the sharpshooters on this side combed it from line to line, and no change was made, and it was introduced as it passed then, and while the gentleman from Wyoming may be right about it, I think we are safe in standing with all the authorities and the ex-Secretary of the Interior and the present Secretary of the Interior.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, a message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On May 16, 1918:

H. R. 8753. An act to amend section 3, title 1, of the act entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1917, and for other purposes.

On May 22, 1918:

S. 3911. An act authorizing national banks to subscribe to the American National Red Cross; and

H. R. 10264. An act to prevent in time of war departure from or entry into the United States contrary to the public safety.

On May 23, 1918:

S. 2123. An act to regulate the practice of podiatry in the District of Columbia; and

H. R. 11628. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide, in the interest of public health, comfort, morals, and safety, for the discontinuance of the use as dwellings of buildings situated in the alleys of the District of Columbia," approved September 25, 1914.

EXPLORATION FOR COAL, PHOSPHATE, OIL, GAS, AND SODIUM.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to oppose the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin to one or two matters. He referred to the fact that potassium was omitted from the bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I said sodium.

Mr. RAKER. The same thing; they are synonymous. I am surprised to hear the argument of the gentleman from Wyoming which he just made in the 15 minutes given him and the 10 minutes he took in answering the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin. I do not know of a Member on the floor raising the question or discussing the proposition of corporations until the gentleman stated that he was afraid the corporations would control the coal, oil, gas, phosphate, and sodium. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this is the first piece of legislation that has ever been brought in that I have been able to find in regard to the disposition of the public lands in this country wherein a corporation is given the right to participate as private individuals under the law, and up to this time no man has raised his voice against it, nor has he moved to strike out the provision as to corporations being given the same rights as individuals.

What is the matter with you? Why have you been asleep for five years and then at the last instant come out and say that corporations are going to control this, when the very bill, in the very first section, that passed this House two years ago a corporation is given the right to participate under this law, and never up to this time has Congress ever been afraid that it was passing legislation to give corporations the right to obtain lands—desert lands, homestead lands, or lands of any other kind. It is a late day now to say that if this bill is workable under the existing law—and we believe it is—that there will be a monopoly. There is going to be no monopoly. The statement that monopoly is going to take the public lands under the just provisions of the bill, when you in the first section give corporations the right to participate in the public lands, it seems to me is a little late in the day.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I can not yield for a minute, as I have a thought and I want to get it out. [Laughter.] I tried to get an amendment before the committee, and I shall read it:

Or to any corporation organized under the laws of the United States or of any State or Territory thereof.

I tried to get an amendment adopted in the committee to that effect, and this is the first time that we have ever permitted a corporation to deal in the public domain of the United States. That corporation might be organized by aliens and have only one or two citizens of the United States. The entire stock might be held by foreigners. No, sir; they would not admit it, and it is a little late now to be talking about corporations controlling our public domains. I want to say to you, as a matter of fact, that if a corporation is permitted under this bill it is all right under the rules and regulations, but there ought to be a provision in here that no corporation that is controlled or owned by a board of alien directors or stockholders should obtain these great valuable deposits of coal, oil, phosphate, and sodium.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Why did not the gentleman have an amendment of that kind adopted?

Mr. RAKER. I offered it in the committee and was unable to get it adopted.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is no more fortunate than I am in getting good amendments adopted.

Mr. RAKER. What strikes me now is that when the members of the committee and other Members of the House allow an amendment like that and give corporations the right to obtain these valuable leases under the Government when we have legitimate provisions to protect the matter they begin to raise their voices and say that corporations are going to control these properties.

Mr. MONDELL. Is the gentleman addressing his remarks to me?

Mr. RAKER. No; I am not.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am not sure that I understood the gentleman's exploitation of the thought which possessed him. Do I understand the gentleman claims there is anything in this bill that will permit a corporation to get title to lands?

Mr. RAKER. Leases.

Mr. CRAMTON. But not title?

Mr. RAKER. No title.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That for the privilege of mining or extracting the coal in the lands covered by the lease the lessee shall pay to the United States such royalties as may be specified in the lease, which shall be fixed in advance of offering the same, and which shall be not less than 2 cents per ton of 2,000 pounds, due and payable at the end of each month succeeding that of the extraction of the coal from the mine, and an annual rental, payable at the date of such lease and annually thereafter, on the lands or coal deposits covered by such lease, at such rate as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior prior to offering the same, which shall be not less than 25 cents per acre for the first year thereafter, not less than 50 cents per acre for the second, third, fourth, and fifth years, respectively, and not less than $1 per acre for each and every year thereafter during the continuance of the lease, except that such rental for any year shall be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year. Leases shall be for indeterminate periods upon condition of diligent development and continued operation of the mine or mines, except when such operation shall be interrupted by strikes, the elements, or casualties not attributable to the lessee, and upon the further condition that at the end of each 20-year period succeeding the date of the lease such readjustment of terms and conditions may be made as the Secretary of the Interior may determine, unless otherwise provided by law at the time of the expiration of such periods: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may, if in his judgment the public interest will be subserved thereby, in lieu of the provision herein contained requiring continuous operation of the mine or mines, provide in the lease for the payment of an annual advance royalty upon a minimum number of tons of coal, which in no case shall aggregate less than the amount of rentals herein provided for.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Remembering my promise not to embarrass this much-embarrassed committee by offering amendments, I rise to discuss the bill and suggest modifications that might be acted upon in conference, and I want again to call the attention of the committee and of those gentlemen on both sides who will be conferees to the proviso contained in this section to the following effect:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may, if in his judgment the public interest will be subserved thereby, in lieu of the provision herein contained requiring continuous operation of the mine or mines, provide in the lease for the payment of an annual advance royalty upon a minimum number of tons of coal.

That is a provision authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to allow coal mines to be closed down upon the payment of a certain royalty. It is a very dangerous provision and is entirely unnecessary. There should be a provision, however, to take the place of that provision or to meet the contingency which that provision was intended to meet. There are conditions when the state of the market is such that mines can not be continuously operated to their full capacity, and if, in line 2, on page 33 of the bill, after the word "mines," the words were inserted, "so far as the condition of the market shall warrant," you would then have a provision which will guide the Secretary of the Interior in the exercise of his discretion relative to the continuous operation of the mines. Secretaries of the Interior, I am sure, always want to be honest, and I hope they always will be honest, and I hope they will never be misled. But there are people in the world who are charged with dishonesty who are honest, and there are very good men who are sometimes misled or misinformed. We should have no provision in the law whereby a mine may close down and be sealed when there is a market upon the payment of a nominal sum in lieu of royalties. Provision should be in the bill under which a continuous operation must be had so far as the condition of the market will warrant.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Would not the gentleman's own amendment make it possible for one of these monopolistic corporations, which he has spoken about, to go into an area and get hold of the coal property before there was really a market available for it and hold it without operation—simply speculate on the future—and shut out anybody coming in who really wanted to develop the property?

Mr. MONDELL. Not at all.

Mr. CRAMTON. Because the gentleman makes it possible to suspend operations dependent upon the condition of the market.

Mr. MONDELL. That is the condition under which operations must necessarily be reduced or suspended. You can not get away from an economic law by all of the words you may write into your statute book.

Mr. CRAMTON. Instead of putting it in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior to determine when this thing shall be, the gentleman puts a clause in there of such vague and wide meaning that it may let a great deal of evil develop.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman does not understand the amendment at all. He has not noted the point in the bill at which this comes or he would have known that my amendment left the whole thing in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary determines to what extent these mines shall operate. He is the man who determines whether strikes, accidents, unavoidable conditions warrant the closing of the mine. This will be just another one of the conditions, entirely under the control of the Secretary of the Interior. Of course, if the Secretary of the Interior was a fool or a knave you might have an unfortunate condition under that kind of a provision, but you would be much less likely to have an unfortunate condition than you would with a provision under which a mine may be sealed up without regard to the condition of the coal market.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. The Secretary of the Interior ought to be in a position to compel operations just as far as the market will allow the coal to be used.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman read just how the language would appear with his amendment in it?

Mr. MONDELL. "Leases shall be for indeterminate periods upon condition of diligent development and continued operation of the mine or mines so far as and to the extent as the condition of the market shall warrant," or words to that effect.

Mr. MADDEN. Under supervision?

Mr. MONDELL. That all follows, put under supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, who supervises and determines all those conditions.

Mr. MADDEN. And he would have the power to compel the operation of the mines if the market justified it?

Mr. MONDELL. Up to the limit, and not only would that provision take the place of the sealed-up provision, but it would give the Secretary authority that he now has not in the bill to compel production up to the point of the absorption of the market.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey: After section 7 insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"And, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, any such lease may provide that out of surplus earnings, if any, accumulated in excess of a specified rate of return upon the net investment of the lessee in any mine under lease, the lessee shall establish and maintain amortization and surplus reserves, which reserves shall, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be held until the termination of the lease, or be applied from time to time in reduction of the net investment. Such specified rate or return and the proportion of such surplus earnings to be paid into and held in such reserves shall be set forth in the lease, and any such lease may further provide that the rest of such surplus earnings shall be annually divided and paid among the purchasers of coal according to the amount paid in by each purchaser in the year, which dividend and payment may be made in scrip bearing interest if such profits have been used in permanent improvements or held as surplus."

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, in the water-power hearing it was recognized by the Secretary of the Interior that in any project for water power, just as in any mining, there might be exorbitant profits. I have known mines that are now paying a thousand per cent, more or less, because of the rise in the price of the commodity. It has always been my idea that in leasing a mine, as in leasing water power, the Government ought to protect the public by having the rates made so low that they would not reap an exorbitant profit, but only a fair profit and that when the party has made, we will say, 25 per cent—make it as liberal as you please—a really large profit—that everything above that large profit should be paid back in the way of dividends to men who purchase the coal or, in the case of water power, to the men who hire the water power. The Secretary had a little different idea. He believed in limiting the profits to a fair return, which is all the party should have, but above that fair return he would apply the surplus in amortization; that is, in paying back the fund that was invested. The difficulty is this: On a 20-year lease 3 per cent a year, which is a small amount, will amortize the whole capital of 100 per cent within 20 years. On a 30-year lease in Canada 1.8 per cent has been found sufficient to return and amortize the whole project in 30 years. In Canada they provide in their leases that the rates shall be reduced so that no more than the ordinary expenses and the amortization fund shall be charged.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. In a moment; when I have completed this sentence. My proposition therefore is—it does not bind anybody, it simply seeks to get this question into the bill—my proposition is that the Secretary of the Interior in proper cases may provide for an amortization fund out of the surplus profits; may provide what shall be a fair return; that is already in the Secretary's proposed amendment as to water power. My proposition also provides that any surplus profits above this shall be returned to the consumer as a dividend, which is practically a reduction in the price of coal. I now yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman's point of view there is that this bill should provide for authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to fix the rate and the amount of charge that the company could fix to its customers?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. No; my proposition is that the price should be fixed automatically, so that if the lessee should make a large profit—a cumulative profit, if you please, up to 25 per cent—that then he shall reduce the price of coal by rebate or dividends, but not seeking an exorbitant price so as to make an exorbitant profit. I hope the gentleman from Oklahoma will allow this amendment—and this is only provisional—to go into his bill so that it could be placed before the Senate and in conference.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois rise in opposition to the amendment?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. Chairman, I would like very much to be able to agree with the gentleman from New Jersey, but here we have a bill that proposes to lease to private owners coal properties, and authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to fix the royalty rate per ton of coal mined, and the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to direct the man who invests the money in the coal mine as to what he is going to do with it. So you have him coming and going. You could not get a man to invest a dollar in a coal mine under a lease with this provision in it. And why should the Secretary of the Interior have the right to say how much the owner of the mine under the lease shall put to surplus? If he has any good business judgment, he will know better what to do than the Secretary of the Interior, and if he is compelled by any condition or terms of the lease to charge such a price for coal as to enable him to pay dividends, and then create the surplus and amortize his capital, he will be charging more to the consuming public for coal than they ought to be obliged to pay. So I hope the amendment suggested by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] will not be given serious consideration.

I think where a man invests his money and is compelled to pay the price the Government fixes for the privilege of operating a mine, that he should at least be given the right to charge the market price for the commodity he produces under the lease, and that he ought to be permitted to exercise his wisdom in the disposition of the profits, if there are any profits when he gets through paying the Government and the cost of operating the mine, as he thinks best. I have never seen a proposal exactly like this submitted for the serious consideration of a body of intelligent men who are supposed to be considering the development of the public domain, with a view to supplying the needs of the people. And I certainly hope that there will be wisdom enough manifested by those in charge of this bill to either have the provisions suggested stricken out on a point of order or that there will be votes enough in the House to defeat it if it comes up for consideration on its merits.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I know how well informed and how earnest the gentleman from New Jersey is, and how keenly he feels about the matter. But I want to call attention to some somber facts, which I think will make him doubt the advisability of adopting such an amendment.

Prior to 1873 coal lands passed into private ownership under the agricultural land laws. The man who homesteaded the surface took the coal with it. Subsequent to 1873 they provided a sale plan and sold the coal land at the flat rate of $10 an acre. There were many objections to that policy. Since 1907 they have been sold pursuant to appraisement, and it has run as high as $500 or $600 an acre. Under that plan 4,267 coal entries have been made, aggregating 610,516 acres. Now, the total coal area in the United States is 53,000,000 acres, a tremendously large body of coal, and there are some 4,000 companies operating on 610,000 acres, which is a very small part of the aggregate. Now, if you pile onto this law such onerous and such cumbersome provisions as to require them to amortize and to require the Government to divide their surplus earnings, my thought is that we would not get any leases and they would resort to the old plan, and I am afraid that the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER], though well and earnestly intended, would operate to defeat the thing we want to do. So I ask for a ruling on the point of order, and if it is overruled I ask to have the amendment voted down.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, there is nothing onerous about this. If I establish a coal mine on condition that I can make 25 per cent every year of all that I put in, but that I shall not make any more, and must reduce the price of coal to my consumers so that I shall not get more, that is fair. If I lower my price so as to get no more, it is right I should get the limited per cent a year. That is the kind of lease this amendment provides for.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. In a moment.

What we want to avoid is a condition similar to this: I know at least of one mine, that I do not want to name, where the value of ore has gone up in the last five years from $5 to $60 because no other mine in the world can furnish as good ore, and the result is they are making several hundred per cent a year.

Mr. MADDEN. Is that a copper mine?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. No. I am not mentioning the mine. Under those circumstances the protection of the public demands that a fair limit of return should be established, as suggested by the Secretary of the Interior, and that the amount of the profits should be reduced so as to give only a fair return.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, wait a minute. I have an amendment there.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROBBINS: Page 33, line 16, at the end of section 7 insert:

"Provided, That the amount of advance royalty so paid shall be credited on royalty accruing under the said lease in any year during the remainder of the term."

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, this bill is founded, I think, on a mistaken basis, that of leasing instead of selling the right to mine coal; but I do not wish to waste any time in discussing that feature of the act. The coal interests of the United States can not be developed on a leasing basis if we wish an economic production of coal, as well as it can be, on a sale basis. Now, this section provides for the minimum rental of 2 cents a ton, which, of course, is a ridiculously low rate, but that is only a minimum to start with. Rentals in the older States have advanced until there are sometimes leases made in Pennsylvania to-day of 52 cents per net ton. Probably these new leases will come up to that value; at least I hope they will. Now, there is a provision in this section that there should be a fixed rental on the land, but no minimum on account of the coal royalty. There is also a provision that this lease is to be readjusted every 20 years—that is, it is to be renewed every 20 years—and that the Secretary of the Interior has a right to change entirely the terms of the lease as to payment of royalty. And there is a provision in the proviso in section 7 that will work a great hardship upon the lessee, because this bill, which ought to be prepared for the purpose of promoting and encouraging the interests of the mining industry on the public lands of the United States, while in fact it is contrary to the purposes it is proposed to accomplish. And one of the essential provisions that ought to be here is lacking for the protection of a lessee, who has to go on these coal lands, explore them, put all the improvements on them, and take all the risk, and pay a royalty to the Government whether he mines coal or not, because in its present form he has no protection whatever in case of dull times and suspension of mining operations. The only protection he gets here is from strikes, explosions, and matters beyond his control. But coming from a mining region as I do, I know there are whole periods of the year when operators can not sell the coal mined because of dull markets. At such times the mining is suspended.

Under this bill you propose to have operators pay a minimum royalty. How will that work out? The royalties under these leases will not be less than 5 cents a ton. There are three things in every coal lease that must be provided for: A minimum output per year and a minimum royalty per ton; and there ought to be another provision that is not included in this bill, to wit, a minimum amount of coal to be recovered per acre.

Now, under the terms of this lease, for illustration, take a lease at the rate of 5 cents per ton, and 100,000 tons, and you will have $5,000 per year royalty accruing for coal that ought to be mined under the lease. If dull times come on or depression of business occurs or lack of markets prevail you compel your lessee to pay $5,000 to hold his mine, in addition to losing the investment on his property, and in addition he has to pump his mine, if it is a pumping proposition; and he has to have it guarded and protected if it is an open mine, even if it is a drift proposition, and must ventilate and pump the mine.

Now, the Government ought not to compel the lessee to pay that $5,000 royalty and get nothing for it. All the leases that I have knowledge of—and in our section of Pennsylvania, where we have many leases, I know something about it—contain this provision for the protection of the lessee, that when his mine is closed down for any cause he shall have the right to mine out coal in the future to the extent of the royalty he must pay as a minimum in advance and have it credited on the coal that he mines out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBBINS. Therefore I say to Members of this House who come from the West, where this coal land is situated—we have no public land in Pennsylvania—I am only seeking to cast some light from experience in the older mining community upon a plan of development of a new mining community, for the sake of aiding in bringing about what I think is intended to be accomplished by this bill, which is to encourage the development of coal lands in the newer States and on the public domain. A lessee in entering upon this domain, unexplored as it is, with the coal somewhat broken up and not persistent as to vein or level or to stratification, as it is in the older States, especially in Pennsylvania, will be confronted with an initial expense that will be startling and that will prevent the development of the coal lands, because if he has to go onto the coal field and drill it with diamond drills to determine its dip and persistency and extent he ought to be in some way protected from the minimum payment of royalty from which this bill does not propose to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to protect him in the covenants of the lease.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I say that this amendment that is offered now does not work a hardship upon the Government, because the Government will be paid for every ton of coal that is taken out under the lease, but it works a great saving and is a great protection to the lessee who must invest all the money in the development of the property; the lessee must develop it; otherwise it is undeveloped and unproductive and without value. He is entitled to be recouped for the minimum royalty he must pay, while he can not operate the mine during the times of business depression or business stagnation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I hesitate somewhat to debate a proposition with a gentleman who, I know, is familiar with the coal-mining business. I am not a practical coal miner in any sense of the word. I may be wrong and the gentleman may be right about it, but——

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman will hear me just a minute. On page 32, lines 23, 24, and 25, I find this language in the bill:

Except that such rental for any year shall be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FERRIS. In just a moment. I know what is in the gentleman's mind.

Mr. ROBBINS. That does not apply to what I am talking about.

Mr. FERRIS. I understand; I think I know what I am talking about. Now, these advance rentals and advance royalties, if they shut down for a year, can all come in under that head, and, in addition to that, they are excused altogether, first, if there be strikes; second, if the elements interfere; third, in case of any casualty not attributable to the lessee shall occur.

Now, what the gentleman from Pennsylvania wants to do is to allow the coal companies to shut down for reasons other than these—these are pretty liberal—for 5, 10, 15, or perhaps 20 years. Under his amendment there is no limit, as I heard it; and then if any rental is paid by them during that interval, they revive the whole lease and bring this rental forward and perhaps pay rental without mining anything for several years. That allows the coal company, in a way, to cold storage its holdings, perhaps allowing people to suffer for want of coal, and no one would really want to do that. Let me repeat. We limit it to one year. Any royalties or advance rentals to keep the lease alive for that year can be credited against the total royalty paid, but we do not cover it over a group of years. And even beyond that, if strikes or labor troubles interfere or the elements interfere or casualties not attributable to the lessee—which, it seems to me, covers everything—he is excused from anything. I think that that is all we should do.

Mr. MADDEN. So that under every reasonable expectation the operator of the mine is credited, under the terms of this bill, for any advance payments that he may make?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Or relieved from payments entirely if the mine should be closed down for any cause over which he has no control?

Mr. FERRIS. That is it.

Mr. MADDEN. I think that is liberal enough.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. Either the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] entirely misapprehends the terms of this bill or else I do. Now, let us understand where we are at. There is no use in talking if we do not know what we are talking about. I read from page 32, beginning at line 17:

At such rate as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior prior to offering the same, which shall be not less than 25 cents per acre for the first year thereafter, not less than 50 cents per acre for the second, third, fourth, and fifth years, respectively, and not less than $1 per acre for each and every year thereafter during the continuance of the lease—

That is the rental that the lessee pays for the land itself. Leases frequently contain that provision—so much per ton for the coal mined, and $1 per year for the rental of the premises, to make the lease a good and binding one, by providing a valuable consideration—except that such rental—

What rental? Why, the dollar a year. To quote line 24—for any year shall be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year.

I am not speaking about rental at all. I am speaking about the minimum royalty that will be contained in this lease, and I can illustrate it by a very common illustration. If the minimum tonnage is 200,000 tons per year and the minimum royalty is 5 cents a ton for coal mined that means $10,000 of royalty to be paid each year.

Mr. FERRIS. There is no minimum tonnage, which disposes of the whole argument the gentleman has been making.

Mr. ROBBINS. These gentlemen have been asserting here from the time this bill came up that the Secretary of the Interior had the power to make these leases and provide rules and regulations over them, and no Secretary will make a lease that does not have a minimum tonnage in it.

Mr. ELSTON. Diligent operation.

Mr. ROBBINS. The "diligent-operation" clause would not cover it, because you could put in a wagon that could haul half a ton of coal at a trip, and make 50 trips a day and that would be 25 tons a day; whereas the mine wagon that ought to be put in would hold 3 tons. Yet this might be "diligent operation." That does not mean anything. The term is indefinite. A coal lease will contain three specific provisions if drawn by a man who understands the coal business. The lease must contain first a minimum tonnage of coal per year; second, it must contain a minimum output of tonnage per acre; and, third, it must contain a minimum royalty payment whether the coal is actually mined or not. When the peace-at-any-price people, during the time of the Civil War, presented a paper to Lincoln for him to sign he said he would sign any kind of a paper if it had at the top of it the statement that the "Union must be preserved." If you put those three provisions into a coal lease, I do not care what you put in otherwise. Of course, the lease will be guarded by provisions as to the width of the entries and the size of the room pillars to be left, so that the remaining coal can be worked, and what drainage and ventilation passages shall be left open, and the right of entry and survey at any time by the owner without regard to permission from the lessee. All those things will be covenanted for, but the three provisions which I have spoken of will be inserted in every coal lease. Now, where is there in this bill anything to allow the lessee who works this coal and who has to shut down because of dull times or a panic to be recouped for the royalty that he will be compelled to pay under the terms of the lease? What is to relieve the lessee from these hard covenants of his lease? Here are the things that he is excused from under this act, and we have them in our leases: "Strikes, lockouts, explosions, and other causes beyond his control." Those words are on the letterhead of every bill of every coal company that is sent out. This act provides for but few grounds of relief, page 33, line 3, "strikes, the elements, or casualties not attributable to the lessee."

This bill provides that the lease shall be for indeterminate periods, and then it is fixed at 20 years. That would be a determinate period. That seems to be a contradictory way of expressing it. And it shall be—upon condition of diligent development and continued operation of the mine or mines.

Diligent operation is a question that the courts will have to decide. Why it should be put in that indefinite way I do not know. "Continuous operation" is a term that must be construed by the ordinary usages of the mining region in which the mine is located. Now, here are the exceptions that the committee in charge of this bill retreats behind so quickly:

Except when such operation shall be interrupted by strikes—

We all know what that means.

The elements, or casualties not attributable to the lessee—

Which means floods or explosions or fire. And then what else?

And upon the further condition that at the end of each 20-year period—

The lease "shall be readjusted."

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman does not contend that under that provision it would be possible for the Secretary of the Interior to insert a clause in the lease that would compel the operator of the mine to pay a royalty while the mine was not operated for reasons beyond his control, does he?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes; I do. A panic is beyond a lessee's control, but it will stop mining operations.

Mr. ELSTON. Casualties——

Mr. ROBBINS. The courts have defined what casualties in a mining operation mean. They mean accident, explosion, fire, or a strike. Those are the things that are specified. It does not provide for the contingency I am referring to, namely, business depression.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROBBINS. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask unanimous consent that at the expiration of 14 minutes, debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto be terminated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that at the expiration of 14 minutes all debate on this amendment and amendments to the amendment be terminated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBBINS. I will yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. ELSTON. In commenting on the phrase inserted in the lease, "diligent development and continuous operation," the gentleman said the interpretation of those words would be up to the court.

Mr. ROBBINS. Certainly it would.

Mr. ELSTON. In the jurisdiction with which the gentleman is familiar would the contingency of a dull market be construed by the court as an excuse for not using diligent development and continuous operation?

Mr. ROBBINS. No. I will illustrate to you what those terms mean. We have certain mines in Pennsylvania where the coal is shipped entirely to the Lakes for transportation by water to the Northwest. During the winter season these mines are closed. That is "continuous operation" in this region, because you could not ship coal when navigation is closed. These terms are construed with reference to the usages of the region where the mines are located.

Mr. ELSTON. I get the gentleman's idea, but referring to the bottom of page 49, it says the Secretary of the Interior is given authority to insert general provisions which may cover such contingencies as the gentleman mentioned. Will the gentleman look at that and say if possibly the Secretary of the Interior might consider a particular locality and insert provisions to cover the cases such as the gentleman has stated?

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I have read over the bill and noted what the gentleman specially calls my attention to on page 49. I have never known a coal lease—and it has been my very good luck to be pretty intimately connected with them on both sides, both as owner and lessee, for a good many years in Pennsylvania—and every coal lease I have known which was regarded as fair, when it came into the court for interpretation has contained provisions for protecting the lessee against forfeiture for failure to pay the minimum royalty payments. If he continued to operate under the lease and observed the covenants, he has always been given an opportunity to mine coal free to the extent of the advanced royalties paid. Some leases, I admit, provide that in "the succeeding year" the lessee shall have the right to have credited on the coal mined for the advanced royalties paid, limiting it to one year. I did not insert this in the amendment proposed because this is a legislative proposition, and the Secretary of the Interior ought to be permitted to work out these details and have a certain latitude in doing so.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Does not the gentleman think he ought to put some limitation on it—he would not allow them to put a mine in cold storage for 25 years?

Mr. ROBBINS. That is absolutely impossible. That suggestion was made by the gentleman from Oklahoma; the cost of carrying a mine, interest charges, and so forth, would prevent this.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Does not the gentleman think we ought to have some limitation on the time?

Mr. ROBBINS. This lease, if you will bear with me a moment, will contain all the covenants to protect the ownership of the United States. It will require the lessee to mine a minimum amount of coal each year. It will require him to work the mine in a workmanlike manner, according to the surveys and plans of experienced mining engineers, and when that is done payment of royalty for the coal mined is required at the end of each succeeding month—30 days after he removes the coal out—which is a hardship and is never enforced in Pennsylvania. The payment of royalties every three months is the usual and ordinary covenant of a lease in reference to the payment of royalty. I am not objecting to that, but I say if you are going to encourage development of these lands you must hold out every encouraging inducement to the lessee who invests the money and installs the initial plant and opens up the mine, and who should have protection and be assured that he can not be compelled to pay a minimum royalty whether he can operate the mine and mine out the coal or not.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, if I believed that under this bill the Secretary of the Interior was authorized to fix a minimum coal output and base a minimum royalty on such an output, then I should want the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania adopted, but there is nothing in the bill that by any possible construction would authorize the Secretary of the Interior to fix a minimum output and charge a royalty on it, whether that output was realized or not. In the present stage of coal development in the West, and in view of the fact that in much of our country the mines can only be operated a part of the year, the lignite mines during the winter and spring and fall, it would not be wise, in my opinion, to give the Secretary that authority.

An amendment which my friend suggests and which applies to conditions in Pennsylvania, where private owners do compel in their leases the lessee to mine annually a certain tonnage and the payment of royalty on that output, would under such conditions be entirely proper. But this law does not authorize the Secretary to do anything of the sort.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is a question. Where is there any provision in the bill that prohibits the Secretary from inserting such a covenant?

Mr. MONDELL. The Secretary can do nothing other than make rules and regulations in accordance with the provisions of this bill. He can not put a provision in the bill calling on the lessee to do or perform anything or make any payment other than is provided in the bill. The provisions as to what he shall pay are definite—he shall pay a royalty and a certain rent per acre, and, of course——

Mr. ROBBINS. What is the use, then, of the provision in line 2, page 33, that says that certain things shall be excepted from the operation of the mine, such as strikes, casualties, and so forth. Why should you have any exception at all if he is not going to be required to mine a minimum amount of coal?

Mr. MONDELL. It is absolutely necessary that the Secretary shall be authorized to compel continuous operation, which, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has just suggested, may not mean operating continuously every day throughout the year in every case—continuous operation under conditions surrounding the mine.

It is entirely proper that the lessee should be guarded against the requirement of operation when the mines close down through causes over which he has no control, but the Secretary has not any authority in this bill, nor do those who know the situation in the western country desire that he shall have any authority in this bill to insist upon or provide for a minimum output.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed upon this amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would state that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] desires some time. I suggest that the time be extended five minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. Very well. The gentleman suggests that we extend the time for five minutes and that will take care of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend the time for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, if, as the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has argued, the Secretary of the Interior has no power to put in a minimum requirement, then the amendment I propose would be a precautionary and safety amendment only. What is the objection to its adoption, then, even on that ground, though I do not agree with the gentleman?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman's amendment then would immediately raise the assumption, it would be practically conclusive of the right of the Secretary to do that thing which we do not desire to give him the right to do, because when we provide, as the gentleman suggests, that minimum royalties may be paid from subsequent mining or output, that provision must be made and necessarily made upon the assumption that he has the power to fix such minimum.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Is it not a fact that we have in effect in this bill a minimum production clause, with reference to the 25 cents and 50 cents and $1 per year rental.

Mr. MONDELL. In a way that is intended to take the place of, we may say, a requirement for minimum production, for if the mine is closed down or the output is reduced the lease runs on and there is a certain amount that must be paid in any case.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. A man has to pay the rental regardless of production, but when the coal is produced he can apply the amount he has paid in on the royalty.

Mr. MONDELL. Within the year.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Within the year.

Mr. CRAMTON. With all due respect to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS], my study of this section makes me believe that his knowledge of conditions in Pennsylvania has led him to read into this section something that is not there, and as a result he has offered an amendment which will not accomplish what he desires to accomplish. Omitting the proviso on page 33, section 7 provides for three things: First, the payment of royalties, not in advance, but at the end of each month, a minimum of 2 cents per ton, and there is no minimum production required; second, an advance rental each year with a minimum of $1 an acre after a certain period; and, third, a continuous operation of the mine is required, otherwise there may be a forfeiture of the lease, except in certain contingencies. The proviso brings in an alternative by which in lieu, not of rentals or of royalty, but in lieu of such continuous operation of the mine there may be required an annual advance royalty. And of how much? Not less than the amount of rental—$1 an acre. The gentleman's amendment is to come in at the end of that proviso, and would simply affect that proviso. That proviso is nothing that is going to complicate things seriously, it will create no injustice; but even if it were, the gentleman's amendment is not in shape so that it would correct anything. He assumes that because leases in Pennsylvania with which he is familiar have contained a provision for an advance royalty of several thousand dollars an acre, that this section contains it or provides for it. On the contrary, instead of its appearing that there is a requirement for an advance royalty, the proviso gives the inference that there is not to be. It provides that in lieu of the continuous-operation requirement there may be an advance royalty, but if the continuous-operation provision is retained, then there is not to be an advance royalty based on minimum production. It seems to me the gentleman has misread the section. Personally it seems to me that it is not to the interest of the Government to be too free about letting these mines lie idle for parts of each year, and thereby diminish production and inflate prices.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That in order to provide for the supply of strictly local domestic needs for fuel, the Secretary of the Interior may, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe in advance, issue limited licenses or permits to individuals or associations of individuals to prospect for, mine, and take for their own personal use but not for sale, coal from the public lands without payment of royalty for the coal mined or the land occupied, on such conditions not inconsistent with this act as in his opinion will safeguard the public interest: Provided, That this privilege shall not extend to any corporation: And provided further, That in the case of municipal corporations the Secretary of the Interior may issue such limited license or permit, for not to exceed 160 acres, upon condition that such municipal corporations will mine the coal therein under proper conditions and dispose of the same without profit: And provided further, That the acquisition or holding of a lease under the preceding sections of this act shall be no bar to the acquisition of such tract or operation of such mine under said limited license.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out in line 22, page 33, the words "own personal," after the word "their" and before the word "use."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 33, line 22, strike out the words "own personal."

Mr. RAKER. I just want to say one word to the committee in respect to it. This is clearly an oversight. That should read "and take for their use but not for sale."

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, the committee will accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Before we leave the coal provisions of the bill I want to call attention to some of the provisions of this legislation that, in my opinion, ought to be modified. I want again to emphasize the objection to the plan of leasing by bidding, by competition. What I am saying may fall upon dull ears, on ears that do not heed them, but I am so impressed with the error, the mistake that is being made in basing leases on the bidding system, that I feel it my duty to continue to express my views on that subject. We may adopt such a policy, but very early in the development of the policy we will discover that we failed to secure what has been claimed as one of the great benefits of the leasing system; that is, freedom from the very great load of investment which would be necessary under a purchase system. This relief from the necessity of large investment for the land it was claimed would enable the man of limited means to get into the coal and oil business, particularly the coal business. Further than that, by reason of this policy, we will make it entirely possible in certain sections of the country for great companies now operating to practically prevent the opening of new coal mines. They can bid so high as entirely to drive out and permanently discourage additional developments, particularly as there will be no difficulty in dropping a lease after it has been knocked down to one of these high bidders and before the bonus has been paid. In the meantime the operator who has gone in and spent his time and money trying to develop the property, and who has been robbed of it by high bidding, will be discouraged. He will have left the locality probably; will have made up his mind it is useless to try to open new and competing coal mines. I do not think it is intended to establish monopoly; it is not intended to strengthen monopoly already established; but that will be the inevitable result of this policy both in the mining of coal and in the production of oil; but I am afraid we are so wedded, at least the committee is, to this plan that we will have to learn our error by trying it out.

One other thing I want to emphasize before I leave the coal provision of the bill. That is the very great importance of modifying the section we have just read, so as to provide a prospecting permit preceding the granting of a lease. I know that all the bureaus of departments that spend the people's money have, as the gentleman from Oklahoma has suggested, approved this plan. Why, certainly; it gives them a job; it affords them an increased opportunity; it gives them a roving commission all over the public domain upon millions of acres containing coal to go out and explore and prospect and divide up into what was known as blocks, but is now termed tracts, the coal lands of the country. There is no one on earth qualified to determine certain questions except the practical man who is going to mine the coal. Our veins are not regular in any part of the West, either in thickness, in quality, or in dip and position. Our coal lands are generally rough.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I would ask to have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, after which, may we have a vote and debate close? I ask unanimous consent that, immediately following the five minutes requested by the gentleman from Wyoming, that debate on this amendment and all amendments close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous debate that at the end of five minutes debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto be ended. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. We have tried this plan of blocking out in Alaska, and I do not think we have been very fortunate or happy about it. We have not secured coal development up there as yet. We are getting no coal up there worth while—no more than could be carried in a bucket. Of course, we hope to have a great development there, and will eventually, but this blocking system has not helped it, and will not help it, but has to some degree hindered it, because it has not given the prospector—the developer—the freedom of opportunity he ought to have to go out in the coal regions and block out his mine himself, study the dip of his vein, the character of the roof and the floor, the point at which the vein may be attacked for economical development, the location at which he can provide for loading and storing, the area that may be utilized for the accommodation of those who are to operate the mine. He must provide for facilities for trackage, and he must, by careful examination and by drifting or drilling, or both, determine the location, extent, and area of the tract necessary for successful development from the point where he proposes to begin operation.

Mr. MAYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. MAYS. The gentleman refers to the failure of the leasing system in Alaska. Does the gentleman believe it will have any better success in this country, as applied to coal development?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I try to be hopeful in the face of certainty that we are going to the system, but I do believe it will be a mistake to adopt these provisions in connection with leasing which have not proven to be wise in Alaska.

Mr. MAYS. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MAYS. Does the gentleman believe that you could raise sufficient capital to finance a coal proposition where it cost a million dollars to develop the mine upon a leasehold interest?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I think it would be very difficult to do it in a great many cases, but we must admit that it may be possible to do it. The Congress is proceeding to legislate on this and leasing lines. While we have our doubts and our questionings in regard to the matter, I assume we are going to try it out; but if we do, we ought to do it under a plan and with provisions that will be practical and workable and under which all comers with some means and with energy and with ambition will have an opportunity. We are inviting people into these fields and we ought to make the conditions as favorable as possible. I know perfectly well from some very practical experiences of my own that I would not want any Government agency to go out and attempt to block out a piece of coal land for me to operate under any system.

I would not want to invite the Government to the very considerable expense of doing that. I would very much prefer to go out and do it myself, because I would be responsible for the economical development of that mine, and I ought to take the responsibility of determining where the vein is to be opened, how it is to be opened, and the areas that I believe I can in an economical way mine from a certain point.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OIL AND GAS.

SEC. 9. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, under such necessary and proper rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to grant to any applicant qualified under this act a prospecting permit, which shall give the exclusive right, for a period not exceeding two years, to prospect for oil or gas upon not to exceed 640 acres of land wherein such deposits belong to the United States and are located within 10 miles of any producing oil or gas well and upon not to exceed 2,560 acres of land wherein such deposits belong to the United States and are situated more than 10 miles from any producing oil or gas well and are not within any known geological structure of a producing oil or gas field upon condition that the permittee shall begin drilling operations within six months from the date of the permit, and shall, within one year from and after the date of permit, drill one or more wells for oil or gas to a depth of not less than 500 feet each, and shall, within two years from date of the permit, drill for oil or gas to an aggregate depth of not less than 2,000 feet or until valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be discovered. The Secretary of the Interior may, if he shall find that the permittee has been unable with the exercise of diligence to test the land in the time granted by the permit, extend any such permit for such time and upon such conditions as he shall prescribe. Whether the lands sought in any such application and permit are surveyed or unsurveyed the applicant shall, prior to filing his application for permit, locate such lands in a reasonably compact form and according to the legal subdivisions of the public land surveys if the land be surveyed; and in an approximately square or rectangular tract if the land be an unsurveyed tract, the length of which shall not exceed two and one-half times its width, and if he shall cause to be erected upon the land for which a permit is sought, a monument not less than 4 feet high, at some conspicuous place thereon, and shall post a notice in writing on or near said monument, stating that an application for permit will be made within 30 days after date of said notice, the name of the applicant, the date of the notice, and such a general description of the land to be covered by such permit by reference to courses and distances from such monument and such other natural objects and permanent monuments as will reasonably identify the land, stating the amount thereof in acres, he shall during the period of 30 days following such marking and posting, be entitled to a preference right over others to a permit for the land so identified. The applicant shall, within 90 days after receiving a permit, mark each of the corners of the tract described in the permit upon the ground with substantial monuments, so that the boundaries can be readily traced on the ground, and shall post in a conspicuous place upon the lands a notice that such permit has been granted and a description of the lands covered thereby: Provided, That in the Territory of Alaska prospecting permits, not more than five in number, may be granted for periods not exceeding four years, actual drilling operations shall begin within two years from date of permit, and oil and gas wells shall be drilled to a depth of not less than 500 feet within three years from date of the permit and to an aggregate depth of not less than 2,000 feet or until valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be discovered, within four years from date of permit: And provided further, That in said Territory the applicant shall have a preference right over others to a permit for land identified by temporary monuments and notice posted on or near the same for six months following such marking and posting, and upon receiving a permit he shall mark the corners of the tract described in the permit upon the ground with substantial monuments within one year after receiving such permit.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to bills of the following titles disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conferences asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WALSH, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. SMOOT as the conferees on said bills on the part of the Senate:

H. R. 8496. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 9160. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 9612. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 10027. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 10477. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 10850. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 11364. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

H. R. 11663. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

EXPLORATION FOR COAL, PHOSPHATE, OIL, GAS, AND SODIUM.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask the chairman of the committee a few questions in regard to this section and incidentally to make a suggestion or two.

I notice on page 34, line 16, that you provide for a prospecting permit. I want to call your attention to the fact that a great many of the tracts of land can not be gathered in one block, and that if you would change that language to "prospecting permits" it would probably be better, and in that way the man would be limited to his acreage of 640 acres or 2,560 acres, although it would not be in one block. There might be several permits issued for small tracts.

And I also want to ask the gentleman this question: On page 35, the first eight lines, you undoubtedly attempt to compel drilling. The language used here on line 4 is:

One or more wells for oil or gas to a depth of not less than 500 feet each, and shall, within two years from date of the permit, drill for oil or gas to an aggregate depth of not less than 2,000 feet or until valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be discovered.

Now, you undoubtedly intend to compel the man to drill, but what do you expect to do if he strikes oil at 300 feet or at any less depth than 500 feet?

Mr. FERRIS. Of course, if that language at the end of line 8, page 35, does not reach that we will have to elaborate it a little. It provides there that unless the oil or gas shall sooner be discovered.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. It does not say exactly that. If you should use the words "unless valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be discovered at lesser depth" I think it would correct it.

Mr. FERRIS. I think the committee would accept it if the gentleman has an amendment prepared.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I have not prepared it. However, I offer an amendment, Mr. Chairman, to strike out, in line 7, page 35, after the word "feet," the following words: "or until valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be discovered," and insert "unless valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be discovered at a lesser depth."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma: Page 35, line 7, after the word "feet," strike out the words "or until valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be discovered," and insert in lieu thereof "unless valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be discovered at a lesser depth."

Mr. FERRIS. I think probably the language of the gentleman from Oklahoma improves it. We have intended that same thing. Therefore I have no objection. I think it makes it better.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think the clause should be placed after the word "permit," in line 6, rather than at the end of the sentence, making it read, "and shall within two years from date of permit"?

The CHAIRMAN. Just a moment; there is some question in the mind of the Clerk as to the tautology of this amendment. Will the gentleman from Oklahoma please repeat it?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. To strike out the following words, commencing in line 7, or until valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be discovered."

The CHAIRMAN. That is sufficient. The Clerk has it now.

Mr. STAFFORD. The only question is whether the clause would not have a better place after the word "permit," in line 6, page 35, rather than at the end of the sentence.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CHANDLER] yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CHANDLER] yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER]?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Yes; I yield.

Mr. RAKER. Under this provision a man must go down not less than 2,000 feet, unless he strikes a valuable deposit of oil or gas before then.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. That is what I am trying to do.

Mr. RAKER. Under the language it now reads, "Or until valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be discovered." If he goes down 100 feet and strikes valuable deposits of oil or gas, he complies with the law. The language here was put in after much consideration by the committee. I can not get the gentleman's distinction. In other words, he must go down at least 2,000 feet, according to the gentleman's idea, if he does not discover anything; but the moment he discovers valuable oil or gas at a depth of 100 feet or 200 feet or 300 feet he complies with the law.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. That is what I want to effect.

Mr. RAKER. "Or until valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be discovered." Now, if he can not discover such deposits at 2,000 feet he has got to go down 3,000 or 4,000 or 5,000 feet, which he ought to do.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. He can throw up his permit at any time. You will find that a man who drills to 2,000 feet will not quit until he has gone as far as he can. A man who has put that much money in a lease will go on drilling.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. In a moment. Under the terms of this bill, if you strike valuable oil or gas at 300 feet, you would be compelled to go on down and destroy a good oil well.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no. The very purpose is that he has got to go down during that two years 2,000 feet, unless he has discovered valuable oil or gas.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I am trying to get the idea of the gentleman.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Now, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Does not the gentleman's amendment make it not positive that he should go more than 2,000 feet? If he does not discover it, he can stop at 2,000 feet and not try to go deeper.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. The permit is played out, anyway.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, I think the purpose aimed at by the gentleman from Oklahoma would be obtained by leaving the language of the paragraph as it is, but inserting the language of the gentleman after the word "permit" on line 6 of page 35. Would not that carry out the purpose by inserting the amendment at that place and leaving the language as it is, to obviate the objection made by the committee? The language would then read "and shall, within two years from the date of the permit, unless valuable deposits of oil or gas shall have been discovered at a lesser depth, drill for oil or gas to an aggregate depth of not less than 2,000 feet, or until valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be discovered."

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I would suggest, if it is in the intention of the committee to insist on drilling on down, if my amendment followed the word "discovered," it would probably clarify the situation still more. What you want is the oil. When the man has discovered it he has complied with his contract and should be permitted to stop.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand, it is the purpose of the committee not to require the prospector to drill in the second year if he has discovered oil in the first 500 feet.

Mr. FERRIS. That is right.

Mr. STAFFORD. But if he has not discovered oil in the first year at 500 feet, it is the idea that he shall keep on drilling during the second year not only to 2,000 feet but beyond?

Mr. RAKER. That is right.

Mr. ELSTON. No. He does not have to go beyond 2,000 feet. He must go on not less than 2,000 feet. If he reaches 2,000 feet he can quit. There is nothing here to require him to drill more than 2,000 feet.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is not the language of the bill which the gentleman has reported. The language requires them to go farther than 2,000 feet if oil has not been discovered up to that distance. It says "not less than 2,000 feet."

Mr. MONDELL. My interpretation of the language is this, that the driller or locator is not required to drill farther than is necessary to make a discovery of oil or gas, and that, on the other hand, he must go on until he does make such discovery, even though he should go more than 2,000 feet. I think what the gentleman desires to reach by his amendment is provided for in the language as it is in the bill. I am inclined to think it is.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I will state to the gentleman that it does not agree with my interpretation of what all the laws pertaining to oil and gas leases are that I have ever heard of.

Mr. MONDELL. It says he shall go to an aggregate depth of not less than 2,000 feet, but until valuable deposits shall have been discovered.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. It means that if he does not find it at 2,000 feet he must keep on drilling until he does, and under that the fact is you will find very few men, if any, who have finances enough to drill oil wells who will go in there and make such contracts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has again expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, as a substitute for the gentleman's amendment I would offer this amendment: To strike out in line 7, page 35, the words "or until" and insert the word "unless"; and in line 8 to insert the word "sooner" before the word "discovered." Then it would read that he must within the two years drill for oil or gas "to an aggregate depth of not less than 2,000 feet unless valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be sooner discovered." I think that would satisfy everybody.

Mr. FERRIS. Does that cure the defect that the gentleman from Oklahoma had in mind?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. That is practically the same thing I have offered, except that I said "at a lesser depth," an expression that is used in practically every oil lease in the United States.

Mr. CRAMTON. The purpose of the committee was to require the man, in diligent prosecution, to go down in two years at least 2,000 feet unless he got oil before. If he got oil before he went down 2,000 feet, then he might stop.

Mr. RAKER. I believe the intention of the committee was contrary to the statement of the gentleman, and I believe he agreed with the bill as it now is, which intends that the man must go down at least an aggregate depth of 2,000 feet. He is going after oil. Now, having gone down that far, he can get an extension of time, and he should not be permitted to withdraw his auger after he has got it down 2,000 feet.

Mr. CRAMTON. The language as it stands in the bill is this: It says that within two years the man must go down to an aggregate depth of not less than 2,000 feet, and until he gets oil. Now, if the oil is down 5,000 feet, he has got to go down that 5,000 feet in two years, and that is not what we meant. We meant that he must go down at least 2,000 feet in the two years unless he gets oil sooner. If he does, then he can stop digging.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Does it not really mean that the permittee must drill 2,000 feet, and if he does not continue drilling beyond that the duration of his permit will not continue?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. His permit expires at the end of two years anyway.

Mr. CRAMTON. The amendment I have offered makes it clear, I think, that he must within two years do one of two things—either go down 2,000 feet or go down until he gets valuable deposits of oil.

Mr. FERRIS. I think the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan carries out the wishes of the committee, and carries out all that is necessary, and by the aid of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CHANDLER], I am sure we will have all the amendment we need. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Michigan, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON as a substitute for the amendment of Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma: Page 35, line 7, after the word "feet," strike out the words "or until" and insert in lieu thereof the word "unless." In line 8, after the word "be," insert the word "sooner."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Michigan, which has just been read.

The substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute is adopted, and therefore the original amendment fails.

Mr. ELSTON. I would like to ask the gentleman, in view of the interpretation put upon the words, whether that same proviso should not be inserted after the provision requiring a drilling of 500 feet in the first year.

Mr. FERRIS. I think it should.

Mr. ELSTON. I think it would do no harm at all to repeat it anyway.

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman will be good enough to offer it——

Mr. ELSTON. I offer the amendment, Mr. Chairman. After the word "each," on page 35, in line 5, insert the words "unless valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be sooner discovered."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ELSTON: Page 35, line 5, after the word "each," insert the following: "Unless valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be sooner discovered."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.
The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I move the same amendment be adopted on page 36, line 23.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

Page 36, line 22, at the beginning of the line strike out the words "or until" and insert the word "unless." In the same line, after the word "be," insert the word "sooner."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.
The amendment was considered and agreed to.
Mr. SULZER. Now, Mr. Chairman, in line 20, after the word "feet," the same amendment that was adopted a moment ago should be inserted.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

Page 26, line 20, after the word "feet," insert the words "unless valuable deposits of oil and gas shall be sooner discovered."

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, this legislation is a change from the act of February 27, 1865, as amended July 4, 1866, May 2, 1872, and various amendments up until the act of February 11, 1897, which authorized any person to enter lands under mining laws of the United States and obtain patents to land containing petroleum or other mineral oil, and chiefly valuable therefor under the provisions of the laws relating to placer mineral claims, provided that lands containing such petroleum or other mineral oils which has heretofore been filed upon, claimed, or improved as mineral, but not yet patented, may be held and patented under the provisions of this act, the same as if such filing claim or improvement were subsequent to the date and passage thereof.
Likewise the act of 1903 authorized the consolidation of claims and the subsequent act of March 2, 1911, that in no case shall patent be denied to or for any land heretofore located or claimed under the mining laws of the United States containing petroleum, mineral oil, or gas solely because of any transfer or assignment thereof or of any interest or interests therein by the original locator or locators, or any of them, to any qualified person or persons or corporation prior to the discovery of oil or gas therein, but if such claim is in all other respects valid and regular patent therefor, not exceeding 160 acres in any one place, shall issue to the holder or holders thereof as in other cases.
I simply want to say that we are changing the placer mining law so far as it relates to petroleum, oil, or gas. I can not let this occasion pass without calling the attention of the committee and the House to the fact that notwithstanding there has been more or less litigation, more or less trouble growing out of the holding of the department that the discovery of oil and gas made at a particular time was subject to cancellation by virtue of the reservation, and therefore the man was not entitled to his land, but few people realize that the pioneers that adopted the legislation of the placer-mining law were the actual workers and the developers of the Rocky Mountain and Pacific Coast States.
The placer-mining law, which was made applicable to petroleum and gas, and the men who developed that were the class and character of men in this country that no other country on earth has ever known before. They were the cream of the United States and of the world. [Applause.]
These pioneers made it possible for the adoption of laws that have changed the very face of this country, that have given it better laws and better conditions. Their spirit of progress, their spirit of initiation, their determination to do things which they actually did has done more to advance the cause of humanity and man than any other class of men that have taken any part in our affairs of history.
The sons and daughters, the descendants of these men, are the ones that have been interested in the development of California and the West, who have spent their money and their time in developing these oil properties.
Men have gone on their way to that country who have lost their lives. Many have traveled across the desert wastes without water and without food for the purpose of developing that country.
A MEMBER. How did they get there?
Mr. RAKER. How did they get there? They got there by virtue of their indomitable will and courage. Many a man lost his life on the plains that did not get through; but it is through the work of these men that did get there, to their efforts, that development has been made.
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.
Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes more.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
Mr. RAKER. Those of us who have been in that country know it to be a fact that it is through that effort, through the expenditure of their money, through the expenditure of their time that they made it possible to determine that oil exists in that country. Those of us who as young men rode across those plains, where they now have oil, heard everyone say there was nothing there but toads and lizards and sagebrush. To-day they have developed that country, and it is nothing more than right that this Congress in administering the law should give recognition to the honest, bona fide claims of the men who have expended their time and money in the development of that territory. We feel satisfied that the proper adjustment of the leasing law, with proper provisions for remedial legislation, which has been adopted from time to time, will be so arranged that the Government will be protected; that those men who have expended their money will be protected; and that the Government at the same time will have been paid a reasonable and fair royalty upon the oil extracted by those who have used the wells up to the present time. That having been done, all will have been protected, and at the same time they will have been placed in a position where not only the wells now in operation may be used, but every available means and the knowledge of 15 years' experience will be applied to the development and boring of new wells, so that we may be able to supply the present urgent needs for oil in our various war industries, in transportation, mining, and agriculture throughout the Western States.
Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. RAKER. I yield for a question.
Mr. MONDELL. I am delighted to hear the optimistic expressions of my friend from California. I hope he has a sound basis for his hope and expectations. Of course, the gentleman realizes that the provisions of this bill as they now stand are not a proper basis for congratulation or approval.
Mr. RAKER. They are not rosy or flowery.
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired.
Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I do that for the purpose of expressing the hope that the expectations of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], relative to the satisfactory ultimate character of this legislation, may all be fulfilled. The bill as it now stands certainly does not justify our being enthusiastic about it, but as I have stated before, while I have concluded that it would not be possible to greatly modify the bill on the floor and under the circumstances not wise to attempt it, I hope that later in another body and a smaller one than this, the committee of conference, there may be modifications, adjustments, and agreements that will produce a reasonably satisfactory result.
Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, no doubt there are Members here who could answer that better than I, and I presume the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. SULZER] might do it better than I, but I think I can give the gentleman reasons satisfactory to him. Alaska is far removed from continental United States. The conditions in respect to the climate there are rough and cold. In addition to that, there is scarcely a well in the entire Territory that yields over five barrels a day. There is no oil production going on up there. The oil development is in its infancy and men at very great hazard and expense and under every sort of adverse circumstance have been putting their money in there striving to develop that area. It was the thought of the committee that we ought to be a little more liberal with them than we could be in a country where we know where the oil deposits are, and where there are gushers and where the territory is well defined and producing millions of barrels.
Mr. ELSTON. And there was also another reason, and that is because the Territory of Alaska is so great. It is as great as any three of four States of the Union, so that five permits to Alaska would not be as much as three to each State of the Union.
Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield.
Mr. MONDELL. Yes.
Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I want to call attention to the bill that calls for five permits to be granted in Alaska, on page 46, while they are limited to three elsewhere. How do they expect a man who has five permits to protect himself in case he finds oil or gas?
Mr. MONDELL. I want to say to my friend from Oklahoma, that I congratulate him and his committee that, whereas the former bill only allowed one lease in all the United States, his present bill allows three in each State in the Union. I congratulate the committee, and I take some credit for the change of mind on their part, because that is one of the things I have been insisting upon from the time this bill was first introduced. Gentlemen will remember I insisted that the provision limiting an individual or corporation to one lease was not sound or fair. Like some other things I said in regard to this bill, that appeal for a time fell on deaf ears. Evidently the truth sufficiently insisted upon and frequently repeated will eventually sink in, particularly when addressed to the minds of intelligent gentlemen like those who constitute the Committee on the Public Lands. I congratulate the committee for having departed from the notion that an American citizen should have but one opportunity anywhere on the public domain to blow in his good money trying to discover oil.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. The committee of Wyoming and Colorado oil men who were here offered a number of amendments to this section, and most of them have, I think, been adopted by the committee. They all tend to make the legislation better. The provision which they proposed of three leases in a State does not appear in this section, but appears further over in the bill in another section, so that is provided for. The bill will go to conference and in the cloistered precincts of the conference committee gentlemen will have an opportunity to study all these things very carefully and examine and pass upon them with deliberation. Among other things, I hope they will somewhat modify the provision that limits to 640 acres the size of a permit within 10 miles of a producing well. This permit you will recall now ripens into a lease. I congratulate the committee on that modification finally brought about after long effort on the part of a few of us to accomplish that result. It must be apparent to everyone familiar with the situation that the provision that limits the acreage by the distance from a producing well is not a wise one. It is not the easiest thing in the world to arrive at any definite basis of determination, but the distance from a producing well is not a logical determining factor. Forty rods from a producing well may bring one into an entirely different geological structure and one may be the wildest sort of a wildcatter within rifle shot of a spouting well. On the other hand, one may be 10 miles from a producing well and still be in an area that gives abundant promise of a splendid product. The rule of distance is not a good rule. The rule of geological structure suggested by the oil men's committee is a sound one, and I congratulate the committee on having to a certain extent adopted that rule.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. ELSTON. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman on that point. I think it was somewhat of a concession to an opinion which probably prevailed in the House that there was something inviolate in regard to the 640-acre limitation as to amount, and the 10-mile limit was thrown in to keep the similarity to the former bill and tie it up to it as closely as possible.

There was no logic or any scientific reason for the 10-mile limitation, because everything the gentleman says is true. Within a few miles from a producing well you can have a different geological structure and that territory be as wildcat as anything and you can not find anything. But I believe the reasons that were urged in the way of policy and compromise have brought this section into the shape in which we now find it here.

Mr. MONDELL. I am glad the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON] takes that view, because this is a tremendously important section of the bill. In these provisions we are dealing entirely with future operations. We are not dealing with anyone who has heretofore attached a claim to the soil. We are dealing with the future and with the newcomer, and we want a law under which he can operate, under which he will be encouraged to operate and take the great chances that he always must take in oil development. At any rate, there should be a departure from this limitation of 640 acres, unless we confine the limitation of 640 acres, as suggested by the oil men, to the limits of a developed field.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise. It is a little after 5 o'clock, and we have had a pretty good day.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DEWALT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 2812) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of illness in family.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 2646. An act for the relief of Edward W. Whitaker; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 9 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, May 25, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of State submitting a proposed clause of legislation for inclusion in the next deficiency bill (H. Doc. No. 1127); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting draft of a proposed bill to amend section 7 of "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917 (H. Doc. No. 1128); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Postmaster General submitting deficiency estimate of appropriation payable from the postal revenues for the fiscal year 1918 (H. Doc. No. 1129); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an urgent deficiency estimate of appropriation required by the War Department for additional temporary employees for the fiscal year 1918 (H. Doc. No. 1130); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Oakland Harbor, Cal. (H. Doc. No. 1131); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. CRAMTON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10403) for the relief of the heirs, assigns, and legal representatives of William Watson, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 601), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. WELLING, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5497) for the relief of Emma J. Spear reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 602), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6012) for the relief of N. Ferro, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 603), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. ROMJUE, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 907) making an appropriation to compensate James M. Moore for damages sustained while in the service of the Government of the United States, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 604), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. STEENERSON: Resolution (H. Res. 368) requesting the Secretary of Agriculture to furnish certain information; to the Committee on Agriculture.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11718) granting an increase of pension to George S. Taylor, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BRUMBAUGH: A bill (H. R. 12259) granting a pension to Elizabeth A. Lester; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CLARK of Florida: A bill (H. R. 12260) granting an increase of pension to Ambrose White; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CLARK of Missouri: A bill (H. R. 12261) granting an increase of pension to John Jackson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DARROW: A bill (H. R. 12262) granting a pension to Anna Herlehy; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DUPRÉ: A bill (H. R. 12263) granting a pension to Widow Emma Golden; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FREEMAN: A bill (H. R. 12264) granting an increase of pension to Henry Phillips; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12265) granting an increase of pension to Daniel S. Clark; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12266) granting an increase of pension to Nehemiah Watson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12267) granting an increase of pension to Ransom House; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12268) granting an increase of pension to Calvin B. Beebe; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FRENCH: A bill (H. R. 12269) granting an increase of pension to Henry Pfranger; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HELVERING: A bill (H. R. 12270) granting a pension to Sarah Ann Williamson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 12271) granting an increase of pension to John H. Chatham, jr.; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12272) granting an increase of pension to Edward H. Dalton; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LINTHICUM: A bill (H. R. 12273) for the relief of John Mangan; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. REED: A bill (H. R. 12274) granting an increase of pension to John S. Brannan; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SHERWOOD: A bill (H. R. 12275) granting a pension to Etta A. Hood; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SLEMP: A bill (H. R. 12276) granting relief to Capt. J. C. Colwell, United States Navy, retired; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SNELL: A bill (H. R. 12277) granting an increase of pension to James Boshane; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TOWNER: A bill (H. R. 12278) granting an increase of pension to Aaron Lewis; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WOODYARD: A bill (H. R. 12279) granting an increase of penison to John A. Burns; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Petition of the St. Louis Photo-Engravers' Union, No. 10, protesting against the second-class postage provision of the war-revenue bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also (by request), resolution of the St. Louis Chamber of Commerce, recommending that a full census be taken in 1920; to the Committee on the Census.

Also (by request), resolution of the St. Louis Chamber of Commerce, favoring the immediate utilization of the waterways to help relieve congested railroad conditions; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also (by request), resolution of the Associated Retail Confectioners of the United States, pledging unremitting support to the President and the Government in winning the war; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also (by request), memorial of the Associated Retail Confectioners of the United States, urging the passage of Senate bills 3955, 3956, 3957, and 3958; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also (by request), petition of the congregation of the Metropolitan Presbyterian Church of Washington, D. C., asking for the enactment of a Sabbath law for the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. FOCHT: Evidence in support of House bill 11830, granting an increase of pension to George W. Vawn; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, evidence in support of House bill 10565, granting a pension to Clarence W. Durr; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: Petitions and memorials of the National Dairy Conference for the Promotion of Dairy Interests; the Periodical Publishers' Association; the Catholic Woman's League of Chicago; the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island; Parke D. Holland, of Streator, Ill.; the World's Salesmanship Congress; and the Hoblit Community Club, of Atlanta, Ill., praying for the repeal of the second-class postage provisions of the war-revenue act; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petitions of the Ganesha Club, of Belvidere, Ill.; the Women's Missionary Society of Somonauk, Ill.; citizens of Morris, Ill.; the Sycamore Woman's Club, of Sycamore, Ill.; and the Illinois State Federation of Women's Clubs, favoring prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for the period of the war; to the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

Also, petition of citizens of the State of Michigan, relative to the length of freight trains, the equipment of cars, and other matters; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island: Resolutions of Rhode Island Bankers' Association, in opposition to Senate bill providing for guaranty of deposits not exceeding $5,000 in national banks, etc.; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. KINKAID: Petition of citizens of Atkinson, Nebr., protesting against the postal-zone legislation and asking for its repeal; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. NOLAN: Petition of J. B. F. Davis & Son, insurance brokers, and Berger & Carter Co., iron and steel machinery, both of San Francisco, Cal., favoring payment of income and excess-profit taxes in installments; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SNELL: Petition of the First Presbyterian Church, Morristown, N. Y., for the passage of a bill to effectively prohibit the use of any kind of foodstuffs during the war for the manufacture of intoxicating beverages and to limit liquors on hand to nonbeverage uses; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. STEENERSON: Petition of the citizens of Otter Tail, Minn., for enactment of war prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. TAGUE: Petition of the Church Periodical Club, diocese of Massachusetts, relative to the increased postal rates for publishers effective July 1, 1918; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of the West Roxbury Women's Club, West Roxbury, Mass., on the increased postal rates for publishers effective July 1; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, May 25, 1918.

Rev. J. L. Kibler, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, O God, for that voice which calls us, in our need, to look upward to Thee and which speaks to us as only God can speak to a human soul. We thank Thee for those lofty principles which emanate from Thee and which are born in our hearts under the influence of Thy redeeming love and which are designed to direct all our steps aright.

O God, help us to walk according to this rule. In all our hopes and plans and ambitions for peace or war, at home or abroad, on the land, on the sea, may we seek to make the world better only by bringing ourselves into harmony with Thy will, in the accomplishment of Thy purposes, and in the carrying out of Thy plans. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, May 23, 1918, when, on request of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I present and ask to have printed in the RECORD a communication from Theodore Roosevelt in answer to a letter of the Postmaster General relative to the regulation of the passage through the mails of newspapers and other publications.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE KANSAS CITY STAR.
OFFICE OF THEODORE ROOSEVELT, 347 MADISON AVENUE,
New York, May 22, 1918.

MY DEAR SENATOR POINDEXTER: The following article from me appeared in the Kansas City Star on May 7, 1918:

"Sedition, a Free Press, and Personal Rule."

"The legislation now being enacted by Congress should deal drastically with sedition. It should also guarantee the right of the press and people to speak the truth freely of all their public servants, including the President, and to criticize them in the severest terms of truth whenever they come short in their public duty. Finally, Congress should grant the Executive the amplest powers to act as an Executive and should hold him to stern accountability for failure so to act, but it should itself do the actual lawmaking and should clearly define the lines and limits of action and should retain and use the fullest powers of investigation into and supervision over such action. Sedition is a form of treason. It is an offense against the country, not against the President. At this time to oppose the draft or sending our armies to Europe, to uphold Germany, to attack our allies, to oppose raising the money necessary to carry on the war are at least forms of moral sedition, while to act as a German spy or to encourage German spies, to use money or intrigue in the corrupt service of Germany, to tamper with our war manufactures and to encourage our soldiers to desert or to fail in their duty, and all similar actions, are forms of undoubtedly illegal sedition. For some of these offenses death should be summarily inflicted. For all the punishment should be severe.

"The administration has been gravely remiss in dealing with such acts.

"Free speech, exercised both individually and through a free press, is a necessity in any country where the people are themselves free. Our Government is the servant of the people, whereas in Germany it is the master of the people. This is because the American people are free and the German people are not free. The President is merely the most important among a large number of public servants. He should be supported or opposed exactly to the degree which is warranted by his good conduct or bad conduct, his efficiency or inefficiency, in rendering loyal, able, and disinterested service to the Nation as a whole. Therefore it is absolutely necessary that there should be full liberty to tell the truth about his acts, and this means that it is exactly as necessary to blame him when he does wrong as to praise him when he does right. Any other attitude in an American citizen is both base and servile. To announce that there must be no criticism of the President, or that we are to stand by the President, right or wrong, is not only unpatriotic and servile, but is morally treasonable to the American public. Nothing but the truth should be spoken about him or anyone else. But it is even more important to tell the truth, pleasant or unpleasant, about him than about anyone else.

"During the last year the administration has shown itself anxious to punish the newspapers which uphold the war, but which have told the truth about the administration's failure to conduct the war efficiently; whereas it has failed to proceed against various powerful newspapers which opposed the war or attacked our allies or directly or indirectly aided Germany against this country, as these papers upheld the administration and defended its inefficiency. Therefore, no additional power should be given the administration to deal with papers for criticizing the administration. And, moreover, Congress should closely scrutinize the way the Postmaster General and Attorney General have already exercised discrimination between the papers they prosecuted and the papers they failed to prosecute.

"Congress should give the President full power for efficient executive action. It should not abrogate its own power. It should define how he is to reorganize the administration. It should say how large an army we are to have and not leave the decision to the amiable Secretary of War, who has for two years shown such inefficiency. It should declare for an army of 5,000,000 men and inform the Secretary that it would give him more the minute he asks for more."

Thereupon Postmaster General Burleson issued the following statement:

"OFFICE OF INFORMATION,
"POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
"May 8, 1918.

"Postmaster General Burleson to-day made the following statement with reference to the editorial signed by Col. Roosevelt which appeared in this morning's paper:

"Ex-President Roosevelt in the newspapers this morning made the following statement:

"'During the last year the administration has shown itself anxious to punish the newspapers which upheld the war, but which told the truth about the administration's failure to conduct the war efficiently; whereas it has failed to proceed against various powerful newspapers which opposed the war or attacked our allies or directly or indirectly aided Germany against this country, as those papers upheld the administration and defended the inefficiency.'

"This statement, taken in connection with other published statements of Mr. Roosevelt, is manifestly aimed at the administration of the Postal Service. It is either true or false. If true, I am utterly unworthy of trust and should be scourged from office in disgrace. If false, right thinking men and women will form their own opinion of the man who uttered it. Its truth or falsity is easily demonstrable. I invite Mr. Roosevelt to name the papers or magazines which have 'upheld the war but which told the truth about the administration's failure to conduct the war efficiently' which have been 'punished' by the Post Office Department. I invite Mr. Roosevelt to name the newspapers or magazines, powerful or otherwise, 'which have opposed the war and attacked our allies or directly or indirectly aided Germany against this country' in such manner as to violate the law, which have not been proceeded against by this department.

"'Failure on the part of Mr. Roosevelt to respond is to admit his inability to do so.'"

As this was issued officially by the Postmaster General, I desire that a permanent record shall be made of my answer and of the facts that led up to my statement to which the Postmaster General took exception, and which caused him to issue his challenge to me to prove my statement. I therefore wish to put these facts before you in full.

I insert as appendixes to this letter the editorial in the Metropolitan Magazine, in the issue which the New York post office attempted to suppress, this editorial being entitled "Put the Blame Where It Belongs"; and my article in the Metropolitan on "Lincoln and Free Speech"; together with the Metropolitan statement as to its war record (p. 6, May Metropolitan).

I deal with Mr. Burleson and his actions purely because he is the representative of President Wilson, exactly as is Secretary Baker, exactly as is Mr. Creel. President Wilson is responsible for everything that Postmaster General Burleson and Secretary Baker and Mr. Creel do or leave undone. Nothing that any one of these gentlemen says, nothing that any one of them does, and nothing that any one of them leaves undone is of the slightest importance, except because he is President Wilson's representative, appointed by President Wilson to a position of high governmental importance in a great crisis and serving as the medium through which President Wilson carries out his policies affecting this country. This is, of course, equally true of all of President Wilson's other appointees. I have scant patience with the timidity or the folly which dares not hold accountable the source of power, and only ventures to express displeasure with the instrument through which the power is exercised. Messrs. Burleson, Baker, Creel, and their associates possess no importance whatever, except that accruing to them because it is through them that the President speaks and acts, or refuses or fails to act. As the above article shows, I was not speaking of Mr. Burleson in particular but of the administration of which he is a part, of the President whose servant he is.

The reason for my comment in the Kansas City Star and for my previous article in the Metropolitan Magazine is that since the war began the Administration has used the very great war powers of the Government over the public press to stifle honest criticism of governmental inefficiency or misconduct, while condoning (which necessarily means encouraging) pro-German, anti-Ally, and therefore anti-American agitation in certain powerful papers which defended this inefficiency and misconduct; and it has sought from Congress a great addition to the already existing power it has thus misused. I believe that the first article of the Constitution guarantees the right of the people to criticise truthfully the conduct of their public servants, and that this right can not be taken away by any law. But the average man is naturally and properly afraid to challenge a law backed by the whole power of the United States Government, even although it may be his belief that ultimately the law will be held unconstitutional.

Our governmental officers, from the President down, are of right the servants of the people, not the rulers of the people. This is the fundamental difference between an autocracy and a democracy. The Hohenzollerns are the rulers of Germany, and the Germans are the subjects of the Hohenzollerns, not their fellow citizens. On the contrary, our Presidents are not the rulers of the American people, but the servants of the American people, and the rest of the people are their fellow citizens. Our duty is to stand by the country. It is our duty to stand by the President—as by every other official—just so long as he stands by the country. It is no less our duty to oppose him whenever, and to the extent that, he does not stand by the country. If we fail to oppose him under such conditions, we are guilty of moral treason to the country. The President and our other public officials are subject to the laws just like the rest of us. It is an infamy untruthfully to assail our public servants—or anyone else. But it is our duty to tell the truth about our public servants, whether the truth be pleasant or unpleasant. The higher the public servant and the more important his task, the more careful we should be to speak only the truth about him; and the more necessary it is that we should tell the full truth about him.

During the past year the action of the administration, taken largely through the Post Office Department, has been such as to render it a matter of some danger for any man, and especially any newspaper, to speak the truth, if that truth be unpleasant to the governmental authorities at Washington. The effect of this attitude has been very marked politically. Such coercive power tends to make upright men, even although they are strong men, cautious about telling truths which ought to be told. It forces weak men to praise the administration whether it does well or ill. It invites unscrupulous men who desire to serve Germany to gain license to do so, and to secure advantages by praising the administration, especially when it has acted wrongfully or inefficiently, and by supporting it politically. There are cases where all competent and honest observers are morally certain that political support has been given, and is now being given, to the administration by various newspapers, especially German-American and semisocialistic newspapers, because of the club thus held over them by the administration. From the very nature of the case there can rarely be positive proof in such cases. But as regards the most striking cases of favoritism, those concerning the Hearst papers, as compared with the suppression of Tom Watson's paper, and the attack (for nominally wholly different reasons) on the Metropolitan, I herein give the facts which prove exactly what I have alleged. The Postmaster General has raised the issue; I meet it squarely; and he shall not evade it. The administration has successfully endeavored to prevent expression of opinion hostile to it and to put a premium upon supporting the President personally and politically without regard to whether his actions are detrimental or beneficial to the country.

The administration, through the Publicity Bureau, under the lead of Mr. Creel, is conducting a gigantic news propaganda with the public money. Mr. Creel's activities are exercised nominally on behalf of the country, but in reality primarily on behalf of the administration. Mr. Creel announces and publishes himself as the special representative of the President, and is permitted by the President so to announce and publish himself. He assails the publications that truthfully expose the shortcomings of the administration; and, without regard to the facts, he, personally and through his bureau, actively upholds the administration as regards those matters, such as the aircraft program, in which there have been grave governmental shortcomings. This is partisan political propaganda of the very worst type, carried on with public moneys, under the guise of public work. The editor of the Metropolitan wrote Mr. Creel on March 7:

"Is it right that you should use the time and money of your bureau, which is supported by American taxpayers, to defend members of the administration from criticism in the public press? Are you not in fact the personal press agent of the President and members of the administration?"

What the editor of the Metropolitan thus stated in the form of a query should be stated affirmatively as an unquestioned fact.

I have said so much by the way of making the general situation clear. Now, as to Postmaster General Burleson's challenge. This can be divided into two parts: First, Mr. Burleson denies that the administration has ever discriminated improperly against any publication, and, second, he denies that it has ever failed to proceed against any publication which ought to have been proceeded against.

First. The Metropolitan Magazine, Collier's Weekly, Philadelphia North American, and New York Tribune have consistently upheld the war. They eagerly demanded that we should go to war, they supported the President in going to war, they have cordially upheld every measure for prosecuting the war. But they have also told, not all of the truth, but some small portion of the truth, which it was absolutely necessary to tell, about the administration's failure to conduct the war efficiently. They have only told even this small portion of the truth when it was imperative so to do, in order to speed up the war and to prevent perseverance in inefficiency. All four of these publications have been attacked by Mr. Creel officially, speaking as President Wilson's representative and "as giving a message from the United States Government to the American people." (I quote from The Independent.) The Government also made an effort about the same time to intimidate the North American, but signally failed, and the facts were set forth in full in an editorial in the North American. The Post Office Department, through the New York postmaster, on March 2 last, notified the publishers of the Metropolitan Magazine that its March issue was nonmailable under the espionage act. This action was widely published throughout the country. It was calculated to do great damage to the Metropolitan. It was precisely the kind of action which, as I know by having been so assured again and again by various editors, was the reason why these editors have been afraid to tell the truth or even a small part of the truth about our governmental inefficiency or misdeeds. The article on which the action was nominally based was by a man who had written articles of exactly the same kind in a publication, the New Republic, which, however, is a political supporter of Mr. Wilson, and has not been interfered with. The Metropolitan is not a political supporter of Mr. Wilson and was interfered with, yet the Metropolitan has upheld the war far more zealously than the New Republic. The Metropolitan immediately asked the postmaster of New York for the grounds of his action, but got no answer. On March 9 it telegraphed the Postmaster General, asking whether the action was taken by the order of the Postmaster General and, if not, what steps the Postmaster General would take to repair the damage done to the Metropolitan Magazine. On March 11 the Postmaster General replied to the Metropolitan, stating that accusations had been made that an article in the Metropolitan was a traitorous effusion, but that he did not know whether the complaints were justified, and that no order had been issued about it by the department. He did not answer the Metropolitan's question as to what steps would be taken to repair the damage done it by the conduct of the New York postmaster. On the same day the New York postmaster wrote the Metropolitan reversing his action of March 2, but making no apology and making no excuse. On March 12 the editor of the Metropolitan wrote to Mr. Burleson saying, among other things, "You must remember that there are a great number of pacifists and pro-Germans in this country who would willingly put the Metropolitan Magazine out of business because it is the most strongly pro-Ally and anti-German publication in the country," calling attention to the fact that a statement attributed to the Solicitor General of the department was obviously not in accord with the facts, and that the Metropolitan could not accept newspaper statements without confirmation from the Postmaster General, and asking for a written statement from the Postmaster General in the matter. He has received no such statement, nor has any attempt been made by the Post Office Department to remedy the wrong it did by the postmaster at New York.

At the same time one of the advertisers in the Metropolitan, Mr. E. M. Mansur, of Floral Park, N. Y., received a letter from a man in Chicago suggesting that he withdraw his advertisement because of the editorials in the Metropolitan Magazine. Mr. Mansur declined to withdraw it. On April 8 he notified the Metropolitan that a special agent of the United States Department of Justice, named James A. Corcoran, with shield No. 436, giving his address as Box 241, Park Row, New York City, called on him with copies of the letters of this Chicago man to him and of the replies and asked if Mr. Mansur had stopped advertising, and wanted to know if he was going on advertising next year, and then if he were an American citizen. The last query taken in connection with the first two contained, of course, an implication that was in effect a threat. This shows that the Department of Justice had knowledge of the attempt to boycott the Metropolitan and lent its official power to further it, unless the man in question had stolen the special agent's shield which he possessed and forged his name and address.

The above facts Mr. Burleson has not denied, and can not truthfully deny, and they absolutely demonstrate the exactness of my statement, so far as the administration's effort to punish the publications which upheld the war but have told the truth about the administration's failure to conduct the war efficiently.

Now, for the second part of my statement: The prime example of failure by the administration to proceed against newspapers which oppose the war or attack our allies, and therefore directly or indirectly aid Germany, is afforded by the failure of the administration to deal with Mr. Hearst's papers as it has dealt with certain other papers. Mr. Hearst is a very wealthy man, reputed to be much more than a millionaire, owning a dozen newspapers, more or less, and a half dozen magazines, in different parts of the country. At the very beginning of the war the Government proceeded successfully against Tom Watson's publication in Georgia. I entirely disagreed with Tom Watson's general political philosophy; I was utterly opposed to his contention that drafted men should not be sent overseas to fight; I regarded him as a narrow, although an upright and sincere man. But he had done nothing that was anything like as dangerous to this country and our allies and as helpful to Germany as Mr. Hearst was at that very time doing. The circulation of Mr. Watson's paper was very small compared to Mr. Hearst's papers, his wealth and influence were infinitesimal compared to Mr. Hearst's wealth and influence, and he had denounced Germany and even advocated war against Germany, whereas Mr. Hearst had in numerous editorials opposed our going to war, attacked Germany's foes, and defended Germany. Yet the administration crushed Tom Watson, a poor man, while it first tolerated and then encouraged wealthy, powerful Mr. Hearst. Tom Watson's paper was not the only small paper the Postmaster General attacked and hampered for doing far less than Mr. Hearst's papers had done. The New York News is edited by George W. Harris, a colored man, for the colored race. Under date of May 2 last Mr. Harris, the editor, received a notice from the postmaster of New York that the issue of that date had been "withheld from dispatch through the mails, pending advice from the Solicitor for the Post Office Department as to whether this issue is mailable." One of the editors of the paper informs me that Mr. Harris called at the post office in New York to ascertain the reason of this order, but was not given any reason. The only explanation the editors could think of was that the paper had contained a protest against an alleged order of a colonel in the Army "directing colored officers not to enforce upon white inferiors a military salute." Certainly nothing in this humble paper warranted the administration, through the Post Office Department, in attacking it, while at the same time not venturing to interfere with the wealthy Hearst papers.

Mr. Burleson, however, while he will pardon certain proadministration papers, even although they are antiwar, will nevertheless occasionally attack not only antiwar but prowar and even proadministration, radical papers, if he objects to their radicalism. Two entirely responsible persons have called my attention to the suppression of one issue of a radical magazine called The Public. This has been an entirely prowar magazine. In its issue of March 30 it urged editorially "heavier taxation of unearned incomes and of excess profits" and the raising of more money by direct taxation in preference to bond issues. Apparently, as far as the editors can make out, it was because of this article this issue was suppressed. A former editor of the paper writes me that it is possible that Mr. Burleson objected to the paper because of an account of an interview with him on October 12 last, in which he was quoted as stating his lack of sympathy with the proposition that a man ought not to get his money from the ownership of land which was tilled by tenants, on the ground that he could not be expected to favor a public policy where his interest lay on the other side of the proposition. "As a landowner you can't expect me to believe that," he is reported as saying. It does not appear, however, that any steps were taken because of this article. The question, therefore, is as to the right of The Public to print the editorial in the issue of March 30. The question as to our belief or our disbelief in the soundness of this editorial has nothing whatever to do with the case. There are plenty of conservative doctrines with which I emphatically disagree, and also plenty of radical doctrines with which I disagree; and if it should happen that on either side of the case I found myself in agreement with Mr. Burleson I should, nevertheless, adhere to my beliefs. But, unless these doctrines were seditious (or represented the kind of immorality and incitement to violence or other unlawful conduct which would properly bring them under the law), I would fight as stoutly for the right of the editor to publish them as I would fight for my own right to publish articles against them. Such action as that of Mr. Burleson does not help the war; on the contrary, it tends to keep people so angry with the agents of the war that they become and remain hostile to the war itself.

There could be no more striking example of discrimination than that furnished by the contrast between the treatment of a paper like Mr. Watson's and papers like those of Mr. Hearst; there was severity of treatment for the helpless, while the strong were given complete immunity.

There is no need to rely upon my statement that the Metropolitan has been a loyal, prowar, pro-American publication. In a letter published by Mr. Creel, since Mr. Burleson's statement was published, he states: "We reply to the Metropolitan for the very reason that we do not reply to antiwar or anti-American papers. They are known to be what they are, but the reputation of the Metropolitan for loyalty gives weight to its misstatements." This is, as shown by the use of the word "we," a complete and full acknowledgment on the part of Mr. Creel that my statements with regard to the administration in this matter are correct. It is a complete and full acknowledgment that the administration acts against a publication whose loyalty is unquestioned, but which attacks the kind of governmental inefficiency which tells in favor of Germany, although at the same time the administration does not act against the "antiwar or anti-American papers"—so long, I may add incidentally, as these papers champion the administration and apologize for the inefficiency of its actions.

Since the Postmaster General's challenge to me was made public, private citizens have taken against the Hearst papers the action which the administration has refused to take. The New York American, in publishing President Wilson's Memorial Day proclamation, omitted that part of the proclamation which contained the prayer for victory, although it printed the part containing the prayer for peace—a proceeding entirely in consonance with Mr. Hearst's advocacy of a "peace without victory." In Poughkeepsie, according to a special dispatch to the New York Herald of May 13, a party of Grand Army veterans protested against such action by procuring every available copy of the American and burning them in the courthouse square, the veterans explaining, through Maj. Louis C. Dietz, organizer, of the local Loyal Service League, that they did this because they regarded the action of the New York American as an attempt "to fool the people of this country by publishing articles that are perfectly agreeable to the Kaiser's Government and to traitors and pro-Germans that are in this country." At the same time, according to the statements in the New York Times and New York World, the mayor and common council of Mount Vernon, N. Y., barred the Hearst papers for the period of the war from Mount Vernon, the mover of the ordinance reading various extracts from Mr. Hearst's papers which he said moved him to take the action he did, while the mayor announced that he signed the bill because he wished "to put a curb on the Kaiser or any of his agents" and that "Mount Vernon will not stand for anything or anyone not wholly American at this time." The mayor of Summit, N. J., is reported to have succeeded in getting the news dealers to refuse to handle the Hearst publications.

I have before me at the moment copies of the New York American editorials of May 11, May 20, June 1, 1915, and an editorial of June 6, 1915, signed by Mr. Hearst himself, dealing with the Lusitania question and stating that Germany's action was right about the Lusitania; that "the Lusitania incident is, of course, no cause for a declaration of War," and that we had no just cause for complaint in the matter—saying that we "had no right to make this demand * * * that Germany suspend her submarine warfare against the commerce of the allies"; that we had "no right to question Germany's use of submarines in her warfare upon British commerce," and that the Lusitania was an English vessel and properly "subject to destruction," and that its destruction by the German submarine was in accordance with the authorized and accepted rules of warfare, and that Germany's methods of submarine warfare "were none of our business." The Hearst papers continued to try to make our people range themselves against England, and therefore in favor of Germany, and to appeal to the people of the United States to put the safety of their dollars above the safety of their women and children. In the issue of the New York American of August 25, 1915, is an editorial headed, "Must the United States be a cat's-paw for England against Germany?" There is not a word in this editorial about the German murder of our women and children on the high seas, not a word protesting against Germany's taking the lives of our citizens, but a scream against England because she had made cotton contraband of war! No American can read this editorial in the Hearst papers of that date without hanging his head in shame that such papers should at this time be backed by the American administration.

Let the administration recall that Mr. Hearst was writing these editorials, week after week, month after month, during the time succeeding the sinking of the Lusitania. On December 5 last, Secretary Baker, the official representative of the President in all matters relating to the war, said, as reported in the public press: "From the moment the Lusitania was sent to a watery grave by the hands of the assassin, the United States had only two choices. The United States could have crawled on its knees to the Hohenzollerns, crying out that their frightfulness and their military efficiency were too great and that we submit and become their vassal; or, as an alternative we could fight. We chose to fight." This is the description by President Wilson's Secretary of War of the course (that we become the vassal of Germany) which Mr. Hearst, through his papers, did his utmost to get the American people to adopt.

After we went into the war, on April 11, 1917, Mr. Hearst wrote: "Stripping our country of men, money, and food is a dangerous policy. Our earnest suggestion to the Congress is that it imperatively refuse to permit the further draining of our food supplies and our military supplies to Europe." This was equivalent to a demand that after going to war we should turn around and help Germany more than if we had continued to remain neutral. On April 24, 1917, the New York American said: "The painful truth is that we are being practically used as a mere reenforcement of England's warfare and England's future aggrandizement." This was an effort against our ally and an effort to pander to anti-English prejudice in the interest of our foes, and nothing else. On May 17 it advocated our spending all our money on preparing our Army and Navy here at home "and so compelling Germany if she wants to fight to come to us," which was, of course, equivalent to arguing that we would render no aid to defeat Germany until she had defeated our allies and was prepared to attack us single-handed. On May 25 the same paper said of the efforts to float the liberty loan: "If you want our food and wealth sent abroad to help suffering England, buy a liberty bond, furnish the sinews of war." In view of Hearst's continued effort to excite hatred between the United States and England, the implication of this sentence can not be mistaken. In the very next sentence he subtly attempts to appeal to all men with a feeling of affection for Germany by intimating that whoever purchased a liberty bond desired to see Germany not merely defeated but "dismembered." On July 27 the New York American spoke of our soldiers being sent over "to be offered up in bloody sacrifice to the ambition of contending nations on foreign battle fields." On November 22 it spoke of our "interfering in Europe's quarrels."

It is absolutely impossible to reconcile the Government's action in proceeding against Tom Watson's paper with its failure to proceed against Mr. Hearst's papers on any theory that justice was to be done alike to the strong and to the weak.

The above quotations from Mr. Hearst's papers and many others like them may be found by any man who cares to examine their back files. The Government had full notice about Hearst, because the allies had barred him from the cable service, and only through the good offices of this Government have these privileges just now been restored to Mr. Hearst. Nor is this all. A mass meeting of thousands of citizens of New York was held in Carnegie Hall on November 2, 1917, under the auspices of the American Defense Society to protest against the spirit of disloyalty shown by certain persons, especially Mr. Hearst. Mr. James M. Beck delivered an address dealing for the most part with Mr. Hearst. This portion of the address I have also included in the appendixes. The New York Times, among other papers, printed this address almost in full. The Government, therefore, had full warning and full knowledge of all of Mr. Hearst's activities. Mr. Hearst's papers have defended our war inefficiencies, have apologized for the failures in the war program, and have even denied such breakdowns as that in the aircraft program. It is true that since we entered the war Mr. Hearst has at various times issued editorials professing great patriotic zeal; but it was at the very time when in other editorials he was attacking the allies of America, England and Japan, in the most offensive way, and at the very time when he was upholding the Russian Bolshevists, who had made Russia a traitor to the free nations of the world and a subservient ally of the German autocracy. Such action can not fail to give aid and comfort to Germany.

By turning to the New York papers of May 8, 1918, Postmaster General Burleson will find an ardent tribute paid by the former German correspondent of the Koelnische Zeitung to Mr. Hearst and Mr. Hearst's editor in chief, Mr. Arthur Brisbane, for having been "auxiliaries of valued influence" to Germany, especially because of "the editorials in the Hearst newspapers." In the New York Times of August 14, 1917, there is a quotation by special cable, via The Hague, from the German Vossiche Zeitung, which states that the "antiwar movement in America is gaining in strength" and that "war propagandists in the New York press have lately met stout resistance from no other than Mr. Hearst and his 30 papers by the issuance of warnings to the people about the danger of plunging into European war," and continues to speak of "the generous nature of the work he had done for Germany" and that Mr. Hearst "preached" in behalf of the central powers. Mr. Hearst earned the praise thus given him by the servants of the Kaiser, and during the time when he was earning it the Kaiser was saying to Ambassador Gerard, as the latter recites in his book: "America had better look out after this war. I shall stand no nonsense from America after the war"—which the ambassador reported to the administration at Washington, without, by the way, producing any effect upon the administration.

Mr. Brisbane, in the Washington Times, ably followed Mr. Hearst's lead. On August 8, 1917, it said: "The most powerful and effective peace worker in this country is William Randolph Hearst. The world wants peace. It is more important than victory." On July 16, 1917, when Russia was under a democratic government and still a fighting ally of the United States against Germany, Mr. Brisbane's paper, the Washington Times, said: "Anarchy rules in Russia; somebody must do something. The natural somebody is Germany; right next door to Russia * * * the civilization of western Europe may be very grateful to Germany if the war finds Germany with enough strength left to undertake the maintaining of order in Russia, developing the resources there and making a few billion of rubles in the process." It seems literally incredible that a paper making an utterance like this could have been left unmolested by an administration that had proceeded against poor Tom Watson—and this paper was published within two blocks of the White House. On August 21, 1917, this paper said: "We have lent to our allies about two thousand millions * * * this we lent our allies to help in the game of murder."

I commend these facts to Mr. Burleson, and also to his Cabinet associate, Mr. Daniels, in view of their recent telegrams of congratulations to Mr. Brisbane, upon assuming charge of certain Chicago papers, reported as being Hearst papers. These telegrams have been published in one of Mr. Hearst's New York papers, the Evening Journal. Mr. Burleson says of Mr. Hearst's alter ego that he "congratulates" the people of Chicago because they are to have the benefit of Mr. Brisbane's "able and unselfish efforts * * * I indulge the hope that (his paper) will always stand for justice and freedom and true democratic government." And Mr. Daniels goes Mr. Burleson one better in expressing the belief that Mr. Brisbane will preach "patriotism" and "civic righteousness."

Mr. Burleson has stated that he has received "more complaints" about my writings than about those of Mr. Hearst. In view of Mr. Burleson's record and actions, there is small cause for wonder in this. Every pro-German and anti-American, every believer in a feeble American war and a triumphant German peace, every man who follows Mr. Hearst, would naturally appeal for sympathy to Mr. Burleson in denunciation of what I have done.

Messrs. Hearst and Brisbane, through their papers, have been unceasing in their attacks upon England and Japan. The New York American on December 20, 1917, said that "the offensive and defensive alliance then negotiated between Japan and England was aimed at the United States." This deliberate falsehood was published at the very time that England was defending us with her fleet and her army. There could be no meaner example of treachery to our allies and of subservience to our enemy. It was a thousand times more worth the attention of Mr. Burleson than anything done by the small papers against which the Post Office Department did act. On September 15, 1917, Mr. Hearst's plea for a German peace in the New York American ran "that the best peace for all concerned is a peace without victory, a peace without conquest, a peace without indemnities, a peace without annexations." On March 2, 1918, Mr. Hearst made an embittered attack upon Japan and on March 20 he repeated the attack. He spoke of the "military despotism of Japan," of the "brutal oriental selfishness in Japan's present attitude," and then asked the question as to who was going to drive her from Siberia, answering it: "Not the allies, for they are too much occupied with their war. Not the United States, because we are putting all our eggs in the allies' basket. There is one combination possible which might drive Japan out of Siberia, and that is Russia in an active and aggressive alliance with the Teutonic Empires." These sentences amount to incitement to Russia to become the military ally and therefore the military vassal of Germany, and to the effort to persuade our people that the war is not our war, but only the war of the allies—that it is "their war." Such language as this, used less than two months before Mr. Burleson issued his challenge to me, is a thousand times more damaging to the United States than anything ever said by Tom Watson or any other of the editors of small papers. For Mr. Burleson to allow the paper making such an appeal to go unchallenged, and yet at the same time to permit, without rebuke, the New York post office to attack a publication like the Metropolitan is incompatible with the supposition that he was thinking only of the welfare of the country.

Mr. Hearst's paper actually stated that it believed "that our Government made a great mistake when it did not meet both English aggressions and German aggressions * * * with armed resistance." This was announced during the war. Yet at this very time England is protecting us from Germany, and without that protection we would be given no time in which slowly to make ready to protect ourselves. If we had begun to prepare in August, 1914, we would have needed no protection from others. But we refused to prepare, and therefore we owe our safety now only to the fact that our friends are able to fight for us against our enemies while we are slowly preparing to fight for ourselves. And Mr. Hearst, under these conditions, expresses regret that we did not go to war against the friend who fought for us! Such a proposal is a proposal in the interest of the enemy, who murdered our women and children.

On September 22, 1917, when the American Nation still had no troops in the trenches, when we had only lent money to the allies, Mr. Hearst touched the nadir of the policy that puts the dollar above the man when he stated that "our Government has the right and power to dictate the terms of peace, and the American people expect England and the other allied Governments to recognize that right and to accept the terms laid down," the statement being preceded by the following: "Having practically exhausted the resources of Russia, France, and Italy, the English Government now seeks succor in our American resources. The money of the American people has been loaned to the allies in great sums. Still greater sums are in readiness to lend them." Statements like this can not but aid Germany. In all of Mr. Hearst's career it may well be doubted whether he has ever proposed anything more sordid than this suggestion to the American people, to a free people with a glorious past, a people proudly able and willing to fight for its honor. The proposal is that we should treat having lent money to the allies as offsetting the fact that these allies had shed the blood of millions of their sons in protecting not only themselves but this country from the brutal dominion of Germany—a dominion under which, if Mr. Hearst's advice had been followed, this country would now be cowering. The debt the allies owe to us for our money is infinitesimal compared to the debt that we owe them for the blood shed by their sons on battle fields where this Nation had as much at stake as the nations whose armies fought thereon. On March 8 last Mr. Hearst, preaching hatred to Japan, and using language tending to serve Germany by bringing about a break between the United States and Japan and perhaps Great Britain, says: "If Great Britain can not restrain her special ally, Japan, from acts of aggression inimical to our interests, we can remove our ships and troops from Europe and transfer them to Asia." This is a threat of war with Japan—a threat that we will enter on a war of aggression in Asia. There could be no possible result of such a threat except service to Germany. It was a threat to abandon the war against Germany, our enemy, and embark on a war against Japan, our ally; and this because Japan, in the interest of the allies and of civilization, had contemplated action in East Siberia against the Bolsheviki, who have shown themselves to be the allies of Germany, the enemies of civilization, and the enemies of the United States.

These quotations show that Mr. Hearst has steadily endeavored to belittle the vital importance to our country of this war, and to excite the hatred of our people against allies who are faithfully fighting beside us; and such conduct can be of help only to Germany, to the enemy we are fighting. Just so long as Mr. Hearst's publications are permitted in the mails, Mr. Burleson is without excuse for excluding any other publication from them. The administration by its acquiescence permits the continuance of Mr. Hearst's campaign, which necessarily tends to give aid and comfort to Germany and to impair the morale of our own people.

The quotations above given deprive Mr. Burleson and the administration, of which he is a part of, any shred of justification for their action and inaction. Mr. Burleson is, of course, only secondarily responsible in the matter. Mr. Hearst's papers are so important and Mr. Hearst's position among the administration's political friends, supporters, and advisers is so prominent, and the action in connection with reinstating him in his cable privileges was so purely dependent upon the President himself, that no subordinate of the President can accept or be credited with the chief responsibility for any action or inaction of the administration in relation to Mr. Hearst. The administration is responsible for the toleration of Mr. Hearst's antially, antiwar, and therefor anti-American activities, and for the reward, nevertheless, given him; and the service rendered on the other side by Mr. Hearst was service to the administration and not to the country. I have quoted above the language of complimentary indorsement in which two of President Wilson's Cabinet ministers have addressed Mr. Hearst's editor, Mr. Brisbane. The President's private secretary writes Mr. Brisbane in the same vein. In the Chicago Herald and Examiner of May 19, last Sunday, appears the following letter, under the heading "A New Subscriber":

"THE WHITE HOUSE,
"Washington, May 14, 1918.

"MY DEAR BRISBANE: When you were at the White House offices today, I forgot to ask you to send me the Chicago Herald and Examiner regularly to my office here. I am sure you are going to make the same good Democratic fight in Chicago that you have been making in your paper in Washington, and I want to see just how you do it.

"Sincerely, yours,

"J. P. TUMULTY,
"Secretary to the President.

"Mr. ARTHUR BRISBANE,
"Care Chicago Herald and Examiner, Chicago, Ill."

Mr. George Harvey has pointed out in the North American Review War Weekly that Mr. Burleson is encouraging enemy-language publications by having a special division whose function is to assist editors of foreign-language papers "in complying with the law." The act of Congress provides that all foreign-language papers should sumbit to censorship or go out of business. The Post Office Department's duty is merely to suppress those of them which are guilty of treasonable practices. Apparently, as Mr. Harvey points out, Mr. Burleson, instead of suppressing papers that preach sedition, establishes a division to show them how they can escape suppression. Mr. Hearst's papers are infinitely the most important of those which during the last year and a quarter have tended to serve Germany and have harmed the United States by attacking our allies or opposing our effective participation in the war. There are various other papers published in English or German which have been less important offenders. On April 2, Prof. Guernsey Jones, of the University of Nebraska, published an article in the Nebraska State Journal on "The Enemy Press." He quoted various articles that have appeared in German-American papers since the war, and some of them as late as January, February, and March last, championing the German-American Alliance, attacking England and Japan, announcing that "the problem of the German press is to save Deutschtum in the United States," demanding a peace which would give Germany the victory, praising Germany's action toward Russia, and in other ways, as Prof. Jones says, showing themselves to be "insolent organs of Prussianism." These papers were being published, and Mr. Hearst was publishing his papers, without interference by the Post Office Department and the Government, at the same time that proceedings were being taken against the Metropolitan Magazine, one of the staunchest upholders of the war and staunchest opponents of Prussianism in all the United States.

Congress has with lavish generosity granted all the administration has demanded to carry on the war. It has also granted the administration extraordinary power, of a kind never hitherto granted any administration, to deal with the internal foes of the Nation; and this power can be and has been misused to reward the administration's personal or political supporters and punish the administration's personal or political opponents. Congress, through such bodies as the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, has exercised its power of investigation and supervision to correct executive inefficiency, executive delay, and executive abuse of power, and has done this in such fashion as to speed up and render immensely more efficient our part in the war. Congress should vigilantly exercise its right of supervision as regards the use of all the great powers it has granted the administration over the properties and activities of the citizens of the United States.

In his last statement about me Mr. Burleson, like Mr. Wegg, at the behest of Mr. Boffin, dropped into verse. As he seems to like poetry, I commend to him and to the administration of which he is part, the following lines:

"Whoso speaks in your presence must say acceptable things;
Bowing the head in worship, bending the knee in fear—
Bringing the word well smoothen—such as a king should hear.

* * * * * * *

Given to strong delusion, wholly believing a lie,
Ye saw the land lay 'fenseless, and ye let the months go by,
Waiting some easy wonder; hoping some saving sign—
Idle—openly idle—in the lee of the forespent line."

Very truly, yours,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

APPENDIX A.

PUT THE BLAME WHERE IT BELONGS.

[Editorial by the editor in the Metropolitan Magazine.]

In order to carry on the war we have had to stop working. This paradoxical situation has been brought about by that same master of paradox who once suggested that we might be too proud to fight and since then has recommended universal voluntary service and peace without victory. We have this much to be thankful for—that the workless days ordered by Mr. Wilson's Fuel Administrator have aroused the country at last to some sort of visualization of the true state of affairs. This situation has brought us shame and humiliation; it has also caused new searchings of heart. The press and the Nation have suddenly discovered that their idol has feet of clay. In the roar of indignation that greeted Mr. Garfield's novel plan for speeding up the war, we missed the customary note of adulation which hitherto has predominated whenever the President or the President's pet ministers were involved. Is the country really beginning to lose its faith in the master of rhetoric who has so long held the people spellbound? Is it possible that some blame will attach itself to Mr. Wilson for the ghastly mess which his administration has made of the war? If such a thing were to happen, it would not encourage us overmuch to believe that the country has at last come to its senses. For it would not mean in the very least that the people had reached the point of putting the blame where it really belongs. All we see in the waves of rage now beating upon the officials of Mr. Wilson's Cabinet or his various kinds of dictators is the melancholy fact that you can only get this great democracy to interest itself in its Government when the pockets and profits of the individual are touched or endangered.

What happened when Mr. Garfield stopped the wheels of industry? First of all a shriek of indignation went up from the country, and especially from the newspapers. Every paper in our vicinity published a protest to the President, signed by a representative of the New York World. Next came a resolution of the Senate to prevent the signing of the obnoxious order. Did anyone stop to consider whether the order was necessary or not? Did Mr. Don Seitz, of the New York World, suggest any other better method of clearing up the fatal congestion and getting coal to the ships in our harbors, so that the ships could sail and the war might not come to a standstill for lack of supplies? Did the Senate offer a better plan? No. The country, the press, and Congress waited until the administration had made about every error that any administration could make, until the paralysis of our transportation system was worse than anyone could conceive of outside of darkest Russia, and then, when our precious fuel dictator, who was partly responsible for the appalling conditions, suddenly threw up his hands, and did what was perhaps the only thing that could possibly avert complete disaster, everyone, newspaper editors, business men, and Members of Congress, yelled their loudest that the order was a crime and must not be carried out. It is exactly as if a householder, having by carelessness allowed his house to get on fire, should implore the fire department not to spout water over his best furniture.

What is needed in such a humiliating and dangerous crisis is not hysterics, but a little clear thinking and self-sacrifice and determination. First of all the clear thinking. Let us try, if we possibly can, to put an end to the school-girlish gush and sickening idolatry which has surrounded the White House ever since Mr. Wilson entered its doors. Under our form of government, Mr. Wilson is entirely responsible and solely responsible for the choice of his Cabinet and for the selection of administrative officers outside of the Cabinet. In no other country in the world, certainly not in Germany or in England or in France, is there a chief executive with so much power, power almost amounting to real dictatorship. For the lamentable failures of the present administration, therefore, Mr. Wilson and Mr. Wilson alone is responsible. Therefore we may expect sooner or later that in spite of all the idolatry of the past Mr. Wilson will come in for a large share of the blame. There exactly lies the weakness of popular ways of thinking. Mr. Wilson is, of course, to blame. It was he who appointed Mr. Garfield Fuel Administrator, knowing well that Mr. Garfield had no knowledge of coal mining or coal distribution, and no executive experience whatsoever. It was Mr. Wilson who allowed the railroads to entangle themselves in the meshes of priority orders and old-time competitive methods, when it was apparent that the transportation of the country must be under Government control. It was he who appointed one man after another to the Shipping Board who knew nothing about ships. It was he who made a pacifist Secretary of War. We need not enumerate at length the errors of choice which have resulted in a ministry of all the incompetents. Of course, the President is to blame. But that is only a superficial view of the matter. We, the people, are infinitely more culpable. After all, Mr. Wilson is doing what his nature and accomplishments permit him to do. He is trying his best to be a good war President. But we—this is a majority of the electorate and not an editorial "we"—made the unpardonable mistake of electing Mr. Wilson President. There lies the real blame.

Perhaps it may be said that we, too, in electing Mr. Wilson acted for what we believed to be the best. Let us not lay that flattering unction to our souls. We acted as a people, according to our worst instincts. The majority of the people elected Mr. Wilson because he had kept us out of war, because he had placed us in a position where we could make the most enormous profits out of the war. We voted for him because he was neutral about the ruin of Belgium and because he was worse than neutral about the sinking of the Lusitania just in so far as straightforward selfishness is better than a pretense of high-mindedness. If most of the people who supported Mr. Wilson had entertained any real expectation that he would go to war under any provocation whatsoever, they would have elected him with the gravest misgivings. They knew what they had to expect. Mr. Wilson went to the White House in 1913 with a program of tariff reform and trust-busting. Old-fashioned, cut-throat competition was his slogan. In the year and a half of his first administration that preceded the war, his antiquated policy had done much to ruin the recovering prosperity of the country. Business was at a low ebb, the railroads were failing to meet their obligations right and left, there had been defaults to the tune of half a billion dollars' worth of railroad bonds; and worse was to come. Mr. Wilson's administration was saved only by the fortuitous circumstance of the war and the evil prosperity reaped out of the war. As an administrator and as a director of the Nation's policy he had been a failure. But he was still able to go to the country on a bogus wave of prosperity.

If, however, Mr. Wilson's peace record was bad, his war record was infinitely worse. At the outbreak of war he not only declared neutrality, but he denounced preparedness. He relied on what he pretended the American public to be, "a citizenry trained to arms," though he and everyone else knew it was a citizenry entirely untrained to arms. From that time on he espoused unpreparedness, though he was finally induced to make speeches about preparedness. He discharged the only man in his cabinet who cared a little about deeds rather than words in the matter of military preparation, and he put a pacifist in his place. And all the time the shadow of war was creeping closer and closer. When the election of 1916 came to pass the people of the United States had every reason to know that Mr. Wilson was neither a peace nor a war Executive. His extraordinary inability to act had been demonstrated a multitude of times, but especially in his dealings with Mexico, where he was forever putting in a hesitating foot only to draw it out again. The people knew all about Mr. Wilson. Then why did they elect him President a second time? Partly because the political wirepullers deprived the opposition of the only real and obvious leadership that could safely defeat Mr. Wilson; but still more because our democracy is not by any means as great minded as it pretends to be. Selfishness, profiteering, lack of foresight, lack of courage, an extraordinarily short-sighted materialism were apparent in the support of the President who had kept us out of war. Ordinary hard-headed business selfishness would have been better than the softness and the hatred of facing sacrifices which were evident in 1916. Mere business selfishness would have compelled memory of Mr. Wilson's first two years and have demanded a more businesslike Executive. It is impossible to think too badly of the motives which dictated Mr. Wilson's second victory. In the future we shall look back on that period—even now we are beginning to look back on it—with grief and humiliation. Never, perhaps, was the national character more obfuscated by gross desires. And so when we see Mr. So-and-so, of the New York World or of any other paper that supported Mr. Wilson in 1916, issuing angry and frightened protests about some order of Mr. Wilson's Fuel Administrator that happens to hit the newspaper proprietor's pocketbook we are inclined to feel a little nauseated. No paper worked harder to elect Mr. Wilson than the World, and none has been more sycophantic in its attitude to the President up to the time the World feared to suffer individual loss. And we are sorry to say that a fairly large section of the public acts just like the New York World. Having voted for Mr. Wilson in order to be allowed to go on profiting by the war, and having hedged Mr. Wilson round with a sanctity that few monarchs and fewer saints have ever enjoyed, they now are beginning to look for some one to blame because they possibly have not enough coal to keep them warm or sugar to sweeten their coffee. We have perhaps reached the worst period of disorganization that so great a country can reach. The warring nations outside of Russia have in all their three and a half years of bitter struggle suffered no such breakdown of their functions as we are now suffering. Things should get better; possibly they will get worse. But our only hope of real and permanent improvement is, first, that the Nation should realize its own culpability and put the blame where it belongs—on its own shoulders. For the Nation elected Mr. Wilson with its eyes open.

Second, that everyone, even if he is a Democrat, should cease to be an idolator and stop talking as if to criticize the administration were blasphemy. No one in England thinks he is aiding the enemy simply because he ventures to suggest that Lloyd-George might possibly be mistaken. Look at Lord Northcliffe's utterances. It is a positive fact that if any American newspapers said about Mr. Wilson what the Times and Daily Mail have said about Lloyd-George and Asquith, Mr. Burleson would refuse to pass them through the mail. Third, let us end the parrot cry of "Stand by the President," and let us resolve to stand by the President with all our strength when the President stands by the honor of the country and enables the country to do what it is longing to do, namely, to fight Germany. When the President is willing to appoint an efficient war cabinet and choose men to handle affairs because they know their job, and not because they don't know it, he will easily compel the support of every patriotic man and woman in the country. There will be no need then for us to keep adjuring each other to stand by the President.

APPENDIX B.

LINCOLN AND FREE SPEECH.

[By Theodore Roosevelt, in the Metropolitan Magazine for April.]

Patriotism means to stand by the country. It does not mean to stand by the President or any other public official save exactly to the degree in which he himself stands by the country. It is patriotic to support him in so far as he efficiently serves the country. It is unpatriotic not to oppose him to the exact extent that by inefficiency or otherwise he fails in his duty to stand by the country. In either event, it is unpatriotic not to tell the truth—whether about the President or about anyone else—save in the rare cases where this would make known to the enemy information of military value which would otherwise be unknown to him.

Sedition, in the legal sense, means to betray the Government, to give aid and comfort to the enemy, or to counsel resistance to the laws or to measures of government having the force of law. There can be conduct morally as bad as legal sedition which yet may not be violation of law. The President—any President—can by speech or action (by advocating an improper peace or improper submission to national wrong) give aid and comfort to the public enemy as no one else in the land can do, and yet his conduct, however damaging to the country, is not seditious; and although if public sentiment is sufficiently aroused he can be impeached, such course is practically impossible.

One form of servility consists in a slavish attitude—of the kind incompatible with self-respecting manliness—toward any person who is powerful by reason of his office or position. Servility may be shown by a public servant toward the profiteering head of a large corporation, or toward the anti-American head of a big labor organization. It may also be shown in peculiarly noxious and un-American form by confounding the President or any other official with the country and shrieking "stand by the President," without regard to whether, by so acting, we do or do not stand by the country.

A distinguished Federal judge recently wrote me as follows:

"Last November it seemed as if the American people were going to be converted into a hallelujah chorus, whose only function in government should be to shout 'Hallelujah!' 'Hallelujah!' for everything that the administration did or failed to do. Anyone who did not join that chorus was liable to imprisonment for treason or sedition.

"I hope that we shall soon have recovered our sense as well as our liberty.

"The authors of the first amendment to the Federal Constitution guaranteeing the right of assembly and of freedom of speech and of the press did not thus safeguard those rights for the sake alone of persons who were to enjoy them, but even more because they knew that the Republic which they were founding could not be worked on any other basis. Since Marshall tried Burr for treason it has been clear that that crime can not be committed by words, unless one acts as a spy, or gives advice to the enemy of military or naval operations. It can not be committed by statements reflecting upon officers or measures of government.

"Sedition is different. Anyone who directly advises or counsels resistance to measures of government is guilty of sedition. That, however, ought to be clearly distinguished from discussion of the wisdom or folly of measures of government, or the honesty or competency of public officers. That is not sedition. It is within the protection of the first amendment. The electorate can not be qualified to perform its duty in removing incompetent officers and securing the repeal of unwise laws unless those questions may be freely discussed.

"The right to say wise things necessarily implies the right to say foolish things. The answer to foolish speech is wise speech and not force. The Republic is founded upon the faith that if the American people are permitted freely to hear foolish and wise speech a majority will choose the wise. If that faith is not justified the Republic is based on sand. John Milton said it all in his defense of freedom of the press: 'Let truth and error grapple. Who ever knew truth to be beaten in a fair fight?'"

Abraham Lincoln was in Congress while Polk was President, during the Mexican War. The following extracts from his speeches, during war time, about the then President ought to be illuminating to those persons who do not understand that one of the highest and most patriotic duties to be performed in this country at this time is to tell the truth whenever it becomes necessary in order to force our Government to speed up the war. It would, for example, be our highest duty to tell it if at any time we became convinced that only thereby could we shame our leaders out of hypocrisy and prevent the betrayal of human rights by peace talk of the kind which bewilders and deceives plain people.

These quotations can be found on pages 100 to 146 of volume 1 of Lincoln's Complete Works, by Nicolay and Hay.

In a speech on January 12, 1848, Lincoln justified himself for voting in favor of a resolution censuring the President for his action prior to and during the war (which was still going on). He examines the President's official message of justification and says "that, taking for true all the President states as facts, he falls far short of proving his justification, and that the President would have gone further with his proof if it had not been for the small matter that the truth would not permit him." He says that part of the message "is from beginning to end the sheerest deception." He then asks the President to answer certain questions, and says, "Let him answer fully, fairly, and candidly. Let him answer with facts and not with arguments. Let him remember that he sits where Washington sat, and so remembering, let him answer as Washington would answer. Let him attempt no evasion, no equivocation." In other words, Lincoln says that he does not wish rhetoric or fine phrases or glittering statements that contradict one another and each of which has to be explained with a separate key or adroit and subtle special pleading and constant reversal of positions previously held, but straightforward and consistent adherence to the truth. He continues that he "more than suspects" that the President "is deeply conscious of being in the wrong; that he feels that" innocent blood "is crying to heaven against him"; that one of the best generals had "been driven into disfavor, if not disgrace, by the President" for insisting upon speaking unpalatable truths about the length of time the war would take (and therefore the need of full preparedness); and ends by saying that the Army has done admirably, but that the President has bungled his work and "knows not where he is. He is a bewildered, confounded, and miserably perplexed man. God grant he may be able to show there is not something about his conscience more painful than all his mental perplexity."

Remember that this is Lincoln speaking, in war time, of the President. The general verdict of history has justified him. But it is impossible to justify him and not heartily to condemn the persons who in our time endeavor to suppress truthtelling of a far less emphatic type than Lincoln's.

Lincoln had to deal with various critics of the "stand by the President" type. To one he answers that "the only alternative is to tell the truth or to lie," and that he would not "skulk" on such a question. He explains that the President's supporters "are untiring in their efforts to make the impression that all who vote supplies or take part in the war do of necessity approve the President's conduct," but that he (Lincoln) and his associates sharply distinguished between the two and voted supplies and men but "denounced the President's conduct" and "condemned the administration." He stated that to give the President the power demanded for him by certain people would "place the President where kings have always stood." In touching on what we should now speak of as rhetoric, he says, "The honest laborer digs coal at about 70 cents a day, while the President digs abstractions at about $70 a day. The coal is clearly worth more than the abstractions, and yet what a monstrous inequality in the price!" He emphatically protests against permitting the President "to take the whole of legislation into his hands"—surely a statement applying exactly to the present situation. To the President's servile party supporters he makes a distinction which also readily applies at the present day. "The distinction between the cause of the President * * * and the cause of the country * * * you can not perceive. To you the President and the country seem to be all one. * * * We see the distinction clearly enough."

This last statement was the crux of the matter then and is the crux of the matter now. We hold that our loyalty is due solely to the American Republic, and to all our public servants exactly in proportion as they efficiently and faithfully serve the Republic. Our opponents, in flat contradiction of Lincoln's position, hold that our loyalty is due to the President, not the country; to one man, the servant of the people, instead of to the people themselves. In practice they adopt the fetishism of all believers in absolutism, for every man who parrots the cry of "stand by the President" without adding the proviso "so far as he serves the Republic" takes an attitude as essentially unmanly as that of any Stuart royalist who championed the doctrine that the king could do no wrong. No self-respecting and intelligent freeman can take such an attitude.

The Wisconsin Legislature has just set forth the proper American doctrine, as follows:

"The people of the State of Wisconsin always have stood and always will stand squarely behind the National Government in all things which are essential to bring the present war to a successful end, and we condemn Senator ROBERT LA FOLLETTE and all others who have failed to see the righteousness of our Nation's cause, who have failed to support our Government in matters vital to the winning of the war, and we denounce any attitude or utterance of theirs which has tended to incite sedition among the people of our country."

In view of the recent attitude of the administration, as expressed through the Attorney General and Postmaster General, I commend to its attention the utterances of Abraham Lincoln in 1848 and of the Wisconsin Legislature in 1918. The administration's warfare against German spies and American traitors has been feeble. The Government has achieved far less in this direction than has been achieved by, for instance, a private individual, John Rathom, of the Providence Journal. This failure is aggravated by such action as was threatened against the Metropolitan Magazine. The Metropolitan—and the present writer—have stood, and will continue to stand, "squarely behind the National Government in all things which are essential to bring the present war to a successful end" and to support "the righteousness of the Nation's cause." We will stand behind the country at every point, and we will at every point either support or oppose the administration precisely in proportion as it does or does not with efficiency and single-minded devotion serve the country.

From this position we will not be driven by any abuse of power or by any effort to make us not the loyal servants of the American people, but the cringing tools of a man who at the moment has power.

The administration has in some of its actions on vital points shown great efficiency (as proved by Senator CHAMBERLAIN'S committee), and on other points has been guilty of conduct toward certain peoples wholly inconsistent with its conduct toward other peoples and wholly inconsistent with its public professions as regards all international conduct. It can not meet these accusations, for they are truthful, and to try to suppress the truth by preventing the circulation of the Metropolitan Magazine is as high-handed a defiance of liberty and justice as anything done by the Hohenzollerns or the Romanoffs. Such action is intolerable. Contrast the leniency shown by the Government toward the grossest offenses against the Nation with its eagerness to assail anyone who tells unpleasant truths about the administration. The Hearst papers play the German game when they oppose the war, assail our allies, and clamor for an inconclusive peace, and they play the German game when they assail the men who truthfully point out the shortcomings which, unless corrected, will redound to Germany's advantage and our terrible disadvantage. But the administration has taken no action against the Hearst papers. The Metropolitan Magazine has supported the war, has championed every measure to speed up the war and to make our strength effective, and has stood against every proposal for a peace without victory. But the administration acts against the magazine that in straightforward, American fashion has championed the war. Such discrimination is not compatible with either honesty or patriotism. It means that the administration is using the great power of the Government to punish honest criticism of its shortcomings, while it accepts support of and apology for these shortcomings as an offset to action against the war and therefore against the Nation. Conduct of this kind is a grave abuse of official power.

Whatever the administration does, I shall continue to act in the future precisely as I have acted in the past. When a Senator like Mr. CHAMBERLAIN in some great matter serves the country better than does the administration, I shall support that Senator; and when a Senator like Mr. LA FOLLETTE perseveres in the course followed by the administration before it reversed itself in February, 1917, I shall oppose him and to that extent support the administration in its present position. I shall continue to support the administration in every such action as floating the liberty loans, raising the draft army, or sending our troops abroad. I shall continue truthfully to criticize any flagrant acts of incompetency by the administration, such as the failure in shipping matters and the breakdown of the War Department during the last 14 months, when it appears that such truthful criticism offers the only chance of remedying the wrong. I shall support every official from the President down who does well, and shall oppose every such official who does ill. I shall not put the personal comfort of the President or of any other public servant above the welfare of the country.

I contemptuously refuse to recognize any American adaptation of the German doctrine of lese majesty. I am concerned only with the welfare of my beloved country and with the effort to beat down the German horror in the interest of the orderly freedom of all the nations of mankind. If the administration does the work of war with all possible speed and efficiency, and stands for preparedness as a permanent policy, and heartily supports our allies to the end, and insists upon complete victory as a basis for peace, I shall heartily support it. If the administration moves in the direction of an improper peace, of the peace of defeat and of cowardice, or if it wages war feebly and timidly, I shall oppose it and shall endeavor to wake the American people to their danger.

I hold that only in this way can I act as patriotism bids me act. I hold that only in this way can I serve in even the slightest degree the cause of America, of the allies, and of liberty; and that only thus can I aid in thwarting Germany's effort to establish a world tyranny.

APPENDIX C.

[Statement in the Metropolitan Magazine.]

The Metropolitan, in February, 1912, in "The Kaiser in American politics," by F. Cunliffe-Owen, exposed the German-American Alliance. (German frightfulness took thousands of dollars of advertising out of the pages of the Metropolitan for this.)

The Metropolitan, in October, 1914, in an editorial "The lesson," by H. J. Whigham, began its campaign for preparedness two months after the invasion of Belgium. (This was months before the submarine menace.)

The Metropolitan, in March, 1915, urged universal service in an article by Theodore Roosevelt, "The need of preparedness." (It wasn't the popular thing to do at the time, but it was right then as it is now.)

The Metropolitan, in October, 1915, called for fleets of airplanes in an article by Richard Harding Davis, "Our eagle without wings." (The American Army had 12 airplanes at this time.)

The Metropolitan in a keynote editorial, "Murder on the high seas," by Theodore Roosevelt, was for America's active participation in the war following the sinking of the Lusitania. (This was the heyday of German activities in America.)

The Metropolitan, on May 8, 1917, in "Put the flag on the firing line," by Theodore Roosevelt, advocated sending American troops to France immediately. (On April 13 Secretary of War Baker stated that "our policy at first (would be) to devote all our energies to raising troops in sufficient numbers to exert a substantial influence in a later stage of the war.")

In brief, this is the war record of the Metropolitan, which won from Secretary of War Baker, with whom it has not always agreed, the indorsement made before Congress as the magazine that has stood for preparedness and was expressive "of those who were most anxious for rapid progress."

This fighting magazine is your magazine. Its power of influence is in your hands; the hands of over 2,000,000 straight-thinking American men and women, who read it every month. This influence should not stop with a circle of over 2,000,000 readers, great as that is. The way to increase it is to talk the Metropolitan to your friends. Ask them, "Did you read Roosevelt's article in the Metropolitan this month?" "Do you know what William Hard is fighting for in the Metropolitan?" "Did you see that editorial on page 5 of the May Metropolitan?" If you want to go further than this, send our circulation manager the names and addresses of your friends who are not now reading the Metropolitan and who should be reading it. Every day seems to make clearer the fact that the decision for an honorable and lasting peace rests with America, and America must hurry. When you increase the influence of the Metropolitan, you are putting your back into the war and hastening to its consummation the peace that will mean a safe world to live in.

APPENDIX D.

[Speech by Hon. James A. Beck at Carnegie Hall.]

No thoughtful American can ignore the portentous possibilities of the campaign of disloyalty and sedition that has been pursued in her midst since the very war began. That campaign was never more active and never more dangerous than it is at this hour.

In that campaign there are many contributing factors. The honest pacifists number thousands, and for their error of judgment we can only have pity, and as to them it may be true, as Jefferson said more than a century ago, that "error can be tolerated as long as reason is left free to combat it." The same is true of the honest Socialists, whose Utopian dream of a community of property and of the possibility of fraternal anarchy, and whose delusion that this great war has been brought about by the capitalistic classes, can only be combated by argument. In the case of the honest dissenter, little, if anything, will be gained by repression. The doctrinaire thrives on repression.

We are to-night concerned with the efforts of pro-German sympathizers to weaken the purpose and sap the morale of the American people by a bastard pacifism.

This serpent must not only be "scotched" but stamped out altogether if America is to be worthy of its great destiny.

The source and inspiration of this spirit is not far to seek. We need not concern ourselves with its minor rivulets and eddies. We must go to the fountain head itself and dam up its pernicious influences.

Its chief source is to be found in the journalistic enterprises of one man, and his name is William Randolph Hearst. His power for evil is immeasurable. He is said to own 17 newspapers and magazines, and as he controls the policy of papers in Boston, New York, Atlanta, Chicago, San Francisco, and Los Angeles the daily influence that he exerts is Nation-wide. No single influence is comparable with the Hearst influence in its potency for evil. His leading organ in this city claims a circulation of 450,000 copies, and if so it is altogether probable that it is daily read by a million people in the section to which it is tributary. His adherents do not greatly exaggerate when they claim for Mr. Hearst a daily audience of 5,000,000 of people. It is thus within Mr. Hearst's power to convey to these millions the subtle poison of insidiously disloyal utterances, and it may be said without exaggeration that the greatest menace to the part which America is destined to play in the struggle comes from the Hearst press.

I shall not impugn Mr. Hearst's motives, except to say that from the time he first became the owner of a great newspaper he has systematically endeavored to appeal to class passion, and to lash the ocean of public opinion into angry waves of class passion.

I do not pretend to know whether his ambition is to rise to power on the crest of these waves or whether he is satisfied, like Mark Anthony in his speech to the Roman mob, to say, "now, mischief, thou art afoot, take thou what course thou wilt." It is possible that his pro-German sympathies are matters of honest conviction, and that he may believe in good faith that the interests of America are best subserved by a sympathetic attitude toward Germany.

Whatever his motives and purposes may be, the inevitable result of his consistent policy as an editor and journalist is to widen the breach between classes in this country, to increase popular discontent, and to weaken the arm of the Government in defending the rights of the American people.

While fairness requires us to recognize that Mr. Hearst can not have personal previous knowledge of all that his editors write, yet he is legally and morally responsible for the consistent editorial policies of his newspapers.

At the beginning of the world war a Hearst journal expressed sympathy with the cause of Germany, even justifying its treacherous assault upon civilization by the assertion that Germany's economic needs could not be satisfied by a "peaceful German expansion in Europe." The defeat of Germany meant "the destruction of the most progressive nation in Europe"; and on another occasion one of his editors said that the issue of the war was "whether the luminous German thought should be victorious or not in Europe." That "luminous" thought is seen in the flames at Louvain and Rheims.

His organs opposed the arming of our merchant vessels when they were attacked in defiance of international law by the ruthless submarine and demanded a popular referendum before congressional authority was given to the merchant marine of America to defend itself against piratical attacks.

His papers deprecated the immemorial rights of Americans to travel on the high seas as the common pathway of nations, and the Journal was "wholly opposed to the policy of making the death of any American who knowingly takes such a foolhardy risk a cause of bloody and ruinous war." Even after the channel steamer, the Sussex, was destroyed, and our women and children perished beneath the waves, his organs said "that the undoubted will of the American people is that Congress should maintain peace." The practical sympathy that he thus withheld from American women and children who were sacrificed in the dastardly sinking of the Lusitania was given to the contention of the Government which sent out the submarines to destroy noncombatants, for one of his organs said editorially: "Particularly do we deplore the sentiment which has been fostered against the submarine. * * * We are making a terrible mistake in this sentimental objection to submarine warfare."

Hearstism pushed its defense of the submarine to the ridiculous extreme of suggesting that the immense loss of life which followed the sinking of the Lusitania was due "to the incompetency of the Lusitania crew."

Hearstism proceed to play upon the innate chivalry of the American people by inviting them to be sympathetic "with poor, bleeding, suffering Germany"; but when that extraordinary appeal met with no response, it attempted to play upon the supposed cowardice of the American people by suggesting that Germany was unconquerable, and that it would simply be a needless waste of our treasure and blood to defend our rights upon the high seas. As late as July 27, 1917, after America had suffered outrages beyond recorded precedent, and our President and Congress had declared war to vindicate the rights of our people, Mr.

Hearst, in a signed letter, demanded an immediate peace rather than send "a million of our splendid young Americans every year for a war to be offered up in bloody sacrifice."

His appeals could not be regarded as founded upon any honest pacifism; for while he invoked us to be neutral rather than inflict injury upon "poor, bleeding, suffering Germany," he advocated the assertion of our rights against England to the very limit, and not only urged war upon distracted and bleeding Mexico, but attempted to foment suspicion and enmity between Japan and the United States.

When, despite his vociferous imprecations and appeals, the United States finally took up the gage of battle that had so often been arrogantly thrown at its feet, the great camoufleur at first affected to support his Government with ungrudging loyalty, but in a short time advised a course of extraordinary selfishness and cowardice. From day to day he insistently urged that "we should keep our own men and money at home for effective defense." He supported this conclusion by the extraordinary arguments that as America would surely win any war in which it had entered, that our active intervention would only result in "prolonging it." His organ added: "If we stayed out of the war—assuming that we could, honorably—that would mean shortening the war." As this argument did not appeal to Americans with red blood in their veins, Hearstism next reached the somewhat contradictory conclusion that Germany was unconquerable, for his organs suggested that "one must first of all recall to one's mind that by declaring war on Germany we act directly in favor of German militarism and make the defeat of the allies as sure as sure can be"; and he again urged that "we should keep our men and our money in this country."

His organs contended that even food should be withheld from the European nations, adding "that every shipment of food and military supplies from this time on is a blow at our own safety," and for this reason Hearstism urged Congress "to refuse to permit the further drainage of our food, supplies, military and money supplies to Europe." To him the only sensible course for this country was to desert our allies, by keeping "every dollar and every man and every weapon, and all our supplies and stores at home for the defense of our own land * * * until that defense is made absolutely secure." Two years were suggested as the limit of time to make our country secure, and thus the cowardly suggestion was made that our country should for two years leave our allies to fight our battle for us, as they had already done for nearly three preceding years.

When these arguments did not impress the American people, Hearstism then proceeded to argue for an early and a separate peace. As no policy could be more destructive of the morale of the American people, I beg your indulgence while I fortify my statement by three leading articles, which have recently appeared in Mr. Hearst's leading organ, the New York American. They represent the very essence of his present policy of cowardice and dishonor, and, having regard to the immense audience to which these words were addressed, numbering millions of our people in all sections of our country, the danger of this subtle poison is unmistakable.

The occasion which had called forth these three articles was the reply which the central powers had made to the recent note of the Vatican. The Pope had issued a peace note, which virtually suggested the same termination to the war as had followed the "Seven Years' War," namely, a return to the status quo ante. To this the German Chancellor had replied with a disingenuous note, which promised nothing whatever that was tangible, but which had the amazing effrontery to suggest to His Holiness that Germany greeted with especial sympathy the Pope's statement that "in the future the material power of arms must be superseded by the moral power of right." This from a nation which had encouraged the 48-hour ultimatum to Serbia and had refused to entertain any pacific suggestion to determine what remained of the Serbian controversy by the processes of reason, was a piece of colossal hypocrisy, which would have caused a Tartufe or a Pecksniff to hide his diminished head.

To Hearst this trifling consideration as to the possible sincerity of Germany in now favoring a peace by negotiation with a view to the limitation of armies and navies was a matter of little importance. To him Germany's oral assent to a principle, which for three years it has steadily denied, and against which its whole career as a nation from the time of Frederick the Great was a consistent negative, was sufficient to terminate the struggle, and require the United States to make an immediate peace, even though in so doing it deserted its allies. He even had the supreme effrontery to claim that in this view he expressed the attitude of the President of the United States. On September 21, 1917, in a full page editorial, Mr. Hearst claimed that the inspired view of the administration was as follows:

"If after Germany has recognized the fair and honorable terms of the United States any other nation or group of nations desires to despoil Germany of territories and indemnities, the United States will not only refuse to aid such proceedings, but will feel in honor bound to call a halt upon them, and to demand peremptorily that Germany shall not be robbed by others because of a victory obtained through the United States."

Stripped of its verbal camouflage, this means that if Germany were willing to surrender the occupied portions of Belgium and northern France, she should be entitled to receive back all her captured territory and not pay one single penny of indemnity to recoup the allied nations for their enormous expenditure of treasure and blood, or even to repair the infinite damage so ruthlessly done in occupied territory. As Germany had taken from Belgium alone $500,000,000 worth of movable property while blackmailing other nations into supporting the civil population, the effect of this proposal of "no indemnities" would necessarily be that Germany would receive an indemnity of the amount of the property that she had so cruelly stolen from the civilians of Belgium, Poland, Russia, Serbia, Roumania, and France, an amount not now susceptible of computation, but probably exceeding $1,000,000,000.

It was then suggested that if Great Britain, France, and Belgium were unwilling to end this war without receiving some reparation for their infinite losses, that the United States was in that event "in honor bound to call a halt upon them," and I know of no effective way in which the United States could thus "call a halt" upon the allies in their legitimate effort to secure justice than by making war upon them. The policy of no indemnities would indirectly give Germany an indemnity in stolen property equaling that wrung from bleeding France in 1871.

To support this monstrous contention, so gratuitously and unjustly attributed to the President, Mr. Hearst proceeds to make the point that England, France, Italy, and Russia "are not our allies," and that "no one has any right to speak of these nations as our allies." He proceeds to state that the distinction between "associates" and "allies" is neither slight nor merely verbal.

I will not enter into any discussion as to the propriety of the word "allies," except to say that an alliance is something more than a piece of parchment with a red seal. It is a fact. It would surprise our brave soldiers in the trenches if they were to be told that the brave French poilus in the same trench were not allies. For myself, the word "ally," if it have any weakness, is that it does not fully express the relation which in the comradeship of blood now binds us to the allied nations. To the eye of imagination there is something more than an alliance created by the present community of the free nations of the world in their common fight against military despotism.

While our soldiers fight shoulder to shoulder in the trenches; while our women behind the lines give to the common cause the very treasures of their souls; while our armies march together, and our statesmen assemble the common resources; while our flags are intertwined, there is created, for the purposes of this war and while it lasts, a new governmental unit. The peoples of the allied nations are therefore not merely allies, but in a sense fellow citizens. "A single front, a single army, a single nation—that is the program for future victory," as the French foreign minister, Painleve, recently said, and to this Lloyd-George replied: "If after 40 months of war, after all the lessons the war has taught us, the allies are not capable of that sacred international union, then in spite of their sacrifices they would not be worthy of victory." Stern and true words, but to Mr. Hearst America is only an "associate" and can desert its allies at will, when its own selfish ends are attained. We are more than allies, for the true bond of the comradeship of blood was never better stated than by Shakespeare when he put into the mouth of his Henry V, on the eve of Agincourt:

"* * * We band of brothers,
For he who sheds his blood this day with me,
He is my brother."

Brothers we are, and, please God, brothers we shall remain, and all the powers of Hearst and Hell will not prevail against that sacred union.

In this editorial, printed less than two months ago, Mr. Hearst then proceeds to give a gloss to the doctrine, which he has had the hardihood to impute to the President. I say this advisedly, for when I had the privilege some weeks ago to present a gathering of representative Americans to the President he impressed us that, whatever his previous views may have been, his present and unchangeable purpose is to continue this war until the demands of justice are fully satisfied.

Let us concede for the moment, although such is not my idea of our national interest or duty, that the United States would be justified, if Germany desisted from its submarine campaign, to make a separate peace and withdraw from the alliance; but upon what possible ground of either human or divine law could the United States say to Great Britain or France, if they cared to proceed to fight for other and greater demands of justice—peculiarly due to them because of their peculiar wrongs—that America would then become the ally of Germany, and proceed to attack them?

Having thus given a counsel of iniquitous cowardice, Mr. Hearst then proceeds to say that anyone who holds a contrary view is either a "war lunatic or a war profiteer," and he proceeds to emphasize the very dangerous doctrine, which, if anything, would sap the morale of American people, that this war is desired by "war profiteers." Those who would not be willing that America should betray the cause of the allies are in this editorial characterized as the—

"ready, willing, subservient lick-spittle tools and agents of blood-sucking war profiteers and foreign governments and censorships, hungry and thirsty for American money and American blood."

On the following day Mr. Hearst renewed his efforts to drive a wedge between the allies. Each one of these editorials is headed by a scriptural quotation, for it was said of old that "the devil can cite Scripture for a purpose." The text which is selected for his leading editorial of September 22 was most apt. It was this: "He that tilleth his land shall have plenty of bread, but he that followeth after vain persons shall have poverty enough."

The text of this editorial was a statement by Mr. Bonar Law, in which the chancellor of the British exchequer took occasion to pay a generous tribute to the help that America had already given to the great alliance. He quotes Mr. Bonar Law as follows:

"We have two special reasons for satisfaction at the coming in of the United States; first, it is the best possible proof that our cause is just and righteous; and, second, we know we now have on our side resources which are more than sufficient to achieve victory.

Mr. Hearst then proceeds to twist Mr. Bonar Law's statement—

"that our resources are more than sufficient to achieve victory"

into an altogether different statement, that Great Britain and France can not win without these resources, and he proceeds to argue that—

"inasmuch as Mr. Bonar Law confesses that the allies were in disastrous straits six months ago, and were saved then by the United States, and still rely upon the United States for salvation from defeat, it is evident enough that our Government has the right and the power, too, to dictate the terms of peace, and the American people expect England and the other allied governments to recognize that right, and to accept the terms laid down by the President."

These terms are, as previously indicated, to accept Germany's hypocritical cry of "Kamerad!" and leave her go, not only "unwhipped of justice" but actually with much of her stolen booty still in her hands.

Consider for a moment the monstrous character of that suggestion of an American newspaper, which has daily a million readers. To tolerate without a protest such a base and sordid suggestion reflects upon every American. In effect, it says that after Great Britain and France had sacrificed more than a million of the lives of their brave sons for the cause of justice, and after they had, according to Mr. Hearst, bankrupted their resources to achieve the same great end—an end which meant our security as well as theirs—that because we have contributed out of our prosperity a part of our enormous resources, we have the right to dictate to our allies, not only that with which we will be satisfied, but that with which they must be satisfied. Such a course would make America the Judas Iscariot of nations, for we would thus betray the cause of justice for so many pieces of silver.

More than a million Frenchmen and Britons sleep the last sleep in the now forever sacred soil of France between the Channel and the Vosges. They died in the faith that they did not die in vain. While, like Moses, they would never be privileged to enter the promised land of a better civilization, yet they died in the belief that they had sacrificed their lives to establish justice in civilization. A peace that would betray in any degree the great cause for which they died would be a betrayal of the dead. It would crucify the cause of justice afresh and put it to an open shame.

Such is undoubtedly the feeling of those in England and France who survive and who have lost forever the fathers, husbands, and sons, who died for as holy a cause as man ever fought for; and yet Mr. Hearst has the baseness to suggest to a million and more of the American people that the mere treasure of dollars that we have contributed, be it little or great, gives us a right not only to desert them when our primary aims are satisfied, but even to rob them of the fruits of their victory and to compel them to be false to their sacred dead.

A more infamous suggestion has never been made in this war by anyone who calls himself an American; and yet Mr. Hearst, in the same editorial, insistently demands that the English Government—

"must recognize the terms of peace formulated by the President * * * and so must the war profiteers here at home, and the newspapers and politicians that are in the employ of the war profiteers or under their sordid influence."

To press home his base suggestion that this war is only desired by the capital class, this most dangerous and unscrupulous demagogue in the whole history of our country adds:

"It is time that * * * these Steel Trust and Powder Trust profiteers and their press, who are apparently eager to see this awful war continue until half the world is destroyed, provided they can make money out of their pretended patriotism, * * * are made to know that they must submit to the reasonable and sensible and humane policy of our Government, as expressed in the President's reply to Pope Benedict."

Again he refers to the "war profiteers" and the newspapers and agents that serve them as men who are "reaping extraordinary profits and fattening their bank accounts while others are suffering and dying and sacrificing their dearest and their all." It is just such seditious poison, injected into the souls of the ignorant and unwary, that has destroyed, at least for the time being, the mighty power of Russia and given its Government and people over to self-destructive anarchy. An idea is more potent than an army, but unfortunately this is true of an evil idea as well as a true one. The great and brave armies of Russia have been demoralized into impotence by a Lenine. Shall America's gathering armies be weakened by a Hearst?

Is any influence more calculated to sap the morale of our people and that of our soldiers? A very distinguished clergyman, known to most of you, who recently preached at one of our camps, recently told me that after his patriotic sermon had concluded he was amazed to have a number of soldiers ask him whether it was true that this war was carried on to profit "big business" in Wall Street. Will our soldiers acquit themselves as men if their minds and souls are thus poisoned? How can our soldiers do their full duty if their minds are poisoned by the suggestions that no cause remains to continue the war, and that its continuance is only due to "war profiteers," who seek to fatten their pocketbooks in the suffering of the Army and Navy? Similar suggestions destroyed the offensive force of Russia's mighty armies and made the streets of Petrograd run with blood. To me the most pitiable tragedy of the war has been the debacle of Cadorna's armies. For a year with unsurpassed martial courage in the rank and file and with a skill in leadership little undervalued to that with which Hannibal and Napoleon won the passages of the Alps, the Italian Army had driven a brave and numerous enemy from the greatest natural fortresses in the world. Then followed the greatest disaster of the war, with its inevitable and serious menace to the prospects of the allied cause, due not to fair fighting, such as would have been worthy of the vaunted chivalry of Prussian militarism, but to the treachery of a portion of the Italian front, whose loyalty had been corrupted by the insidious poison of socialistic pacifism. What the enemy could not accomplish in fair and open battle had been accomplished by his covert propaganda. It is clear that Germany, defeated on the Marne, the Yser, and the Meuse, is now attempting to gain a decisive victory by sapping the morale of its enemies through a propaganda which masks itself under the name of "socialism."

Two days later Mr. Hearst went further in another full-page editorial in his leading organ, the American, falsely so called. He now claimed that the war had practically been won by Germany's reply to the Pope's proposal, and, to quote his words, America—

"without firing a shot in battle, the United States has won the greatest and most momentous victory ever won in the history of mankind."

This flamboyant flapdoodle referred to the disingenuous reply of the Imperial German Government to the Pope, in which Mr. Hearst finds "a sincere desire to negotiate peace upon the fundamental basis laid down by the United States," although Germany has never yet officially said that it would even vacate Belgium, much less make reparation. He then indorses the claim of Germany, to quote his own words—

"that England must lay aside her pretensions to rule the seas and reduce her gigantic naval armaments to limits"—

quite ignoring the fact that the navy of England has not only been her security in the last half century, but our own. Further ignoring the fact that the Imperial German Government three years ago contemptuously repudiated its solemn and oft-reiterated promise, even when reduced to writing and sealed with the red seal, as a "scrap of paper," Mr. Hearst proceeds to wax enthusiastic on Germany's assurance of its sympathy with the principle "that in the futnre the material power of arms must be superseded by the moral power of right," and upon this mere assertion of a Government which has wrapped the whole world in a universal flame and brought the greatest disaster upon mankind that recorded history has known Mr. Hearst accepts this vague promise as a clear acceptance of President Wilson's proposals and a full satisfaction of America's war aims.

We know that President Wilson did not so regard it, and those of us who differed with President Wilson before our country entered the war can now express our great satisfaction with the dignity and power of his note to the Pope, and especially with his inspiring call to arms in his great war message of April 2, and his even more biting indictment of Germany's crimes in his great Flag Day speech. These utterances indicate that the President is wholeheartedly for a peace with victory and retributive justice.

Mr. Hearst, in this editorial of September 24, 1917, regards all things as adjusted, now that Germany has recognized the supremacy of the moral power of right to that of arms; and he thereupon proceeds to sap the morale of the American people by confusing its judgment and paralyzing its will, by this subtle suggestion:

"The attitude assumed by the central empires is a great triumph for President Wilson. It is clear that he will have little difficulty in negotiating a peace with Germany that will raise his personal prestige to an enormous height, that will meet the approval of the vast majority of his countrymen, and that will practically end militarism and make the world safe, indeed, for democracy. The delicate question now is whether the President can bring England around to the acceptance of a reasonable peace upon American terms, or whether that Government will stubbornly insist on a peace upon English terms."

Mark the attempt to drive a wedge between the United States and England! Mr. Hearst says nothing about France or Russia or Italy. The idea is that only England is the obstacle to peace. The insidious suggestion is that the President must now bring pressure upon England, presumably upon the same sordid ground previously stated that as we had contributed money to England, of which she was in desperate need, like Shylock, we could demand our pound of flesh.

That this is Mr. Hearst's idea is shown beyond question in the following significant and iniquitous sentence:

"It is not amiss to say here and now that the President holds all the cards in his own hands, that if he so decides he is fully able to make the allies, as well as Germany and Austria, consent to America's terms, and that if he does elect so to use his power and authority over the situation as to end this war upon the terms he has himself formulated he will find the whole Nation at his back, ready to give him the men and the money to make good America's just and sensible terms of peace against any and all Governments that oppose them."

Mr. Hearst misreads the character of the American people. He also misreads the policy to which the President is irrevocably committed. If President Wilson were capable of the base betrayal of our allies, which Mr. Hearst now suggests, he would not find America behind him. America is now behind our President, because it believes in his wholehearted purpose to wage this war in loyal harmony with our allies until the common ends are fully attained. The man who thus in a leading editorial gravely teaches to millions of Americans that the President of the United States should betray the cause of our allies—now happily the cause of America—is a dangerous and disloyal demagogue.

How long, my fellow citizens, will this man be tolerated? The course of history is one of endless repetitions, and his type is not new to human experience. Two thousand years ago such a man lived in the dying days of the Roman Republic. He was a man of means and social standing, like Hearst—a member of the senate, which Hearst would probably like to be—and the leader of a powerful faction, which Mr. Hearst is. He appealed to the unfortunate and the discontented in order that with their aid he could rise to power. His name was Cataline, and it is a name forever infamous in history.

When he dared to enter the Senate those who sat next to him left their seats and avoided him as a common enemy, and it was then that the great Consul Cicero addressed to him as he sat there "naked and unashamed" the withering words that have come down the centuries:

"How far wilt thou, Cataline, abuse our patience? How far wilt thou carry thy unbridled audacity?"

I am not sure that in the example of the Roman Senate we do not find the only remedy for Hearstism. The processes of law are not sufficient. To maintain the guaranties of free speech and a free press we are obliged, at least in times of peace, to tolerate the baneful excesses of the demagogue; but there always remains a power above and without the law, the consuming power of public opinion, which can burn like fire and blast like lightning. It is true that enlightened public opinion has always condemned Hearstism without ending it, but public opinion is like the rays of the sun. Diffuse it and it does not destroy; concentrate its rays in a magnifying glass and it will consume as fire. Public opinion should be concentrated on Hearst and Hearstism until both he and his organs are the scorn of all honest men as Cataline was when he sat alone in the Senate.

The times are critical and we can not afford to tolerate this fountainhead of demagoguery. Let every citizen awake to an obvious peril, for if the morale of the American people should be weakened by such poison, then the energy of our Government will necessarily decrease, for in a land of free men the Government is powerless unless sustained by a strong and puissant public opinion. In this lies the great peril of Hearstism.

The future of this war, the greatest that the world ever knew, both in its dimensions and in the vital issues which it involves, may, and probably does, depend upon America. Will America fail? If she fails now, she has failed the cause of democracy and civilization for centuries to come. From that supreme infidelity she may never fully recover. If she is true to her great past and worthily acquits herself in this supreme struggle for the right, then no limit can be set to her mighty future. Will we permit that future to be dimmed or defeated by Hearst or Hearstism?

We have many foes without our gates, but none so dangerous as those that are within. If America does not neglect this internal danger; if she have the courage and the capacity to strike down at the very beginning this poisonous serpent of internal dissension, then she will not fail her allies in the greatest and noblest task to which America ever addressed her mighty energies.

As Shakespeare made his Richmond say on the eve of the victory of Bosworth so let me conclude:

"In God's name, cheerily on, courageous friends,
To reap the harvest of perpetual peace,
By this one bloody trial of sharp war."

Mr. SWANSON subsequently said: Mr. President, the Senate has directed the printing in the RECORD of a statement of Col. Roosevelt regarding the controversy between himself and the Postmaster General. I ask unanimous consent that the statement of the Postmaster General, given out on the 19th of May, may also be printed in the RECORD, in a spirit of fair play and justice to the Postmaster General.

Mr. GALLINGER. What is it a reply to?

Mr. SWANSON. It relates to the controversy between Col. Roosevelt and the Postmaster General. A statement of Col. Roosevelt has been directed to be printed in the RECORD. I think, in a spirit of justice and fair play, the statement of the Postmaster General should also be included in the RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. Was the statement of Col. Roosevelt read when it went into the RECORD?

Mr. SWANSON. It was ordered printed in the RECORD, but not read. I do not ask the privilege of having this read, but simply that it be printed, along with the statement of Col. Roosevelt.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, nobody will ever read it, so it will not do any harm.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the matter referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

MAY 19, 1918.

The Postmaster General to-day authorized the following statement:

I have waited patiently for Mr. Roosevelt to substantiate his statement made in the morning papers of May 8 to the effect that the Post Office Department was using the espionage act for political purposes by "punishing papers which upheld the war, but which told the truth about the administration's failure to conduct the war efficiently," and by failing to "proceed against powerful newspapers which opposed the war or attacked our allies or directly or indirectly aided Germany against this country, as those papers upheld the administration and defended inefficiency."

Mr. Roosevelt's reply of May 11, which he then termed "preliminary," in the main evades the issue presented and is thoroughly misleading. He names the New York Tribune, Collier's, and the Metropolitan Magazine in a way which has created the impression that these publications have been the objects of improper discrimination by the Post Office Department.

This department has taken no action against Collier's.

This department has taken no action against the Tribune.

In exposing German propaganda early in the war the department brought to public attention typical seditious matter which was being circulated throughout the country. It made available to newspaper men its files disclosing such disloyal matter. The Tribune promptly availed itself of this opportunity and gave helpful assistance, for which patriotic service I personally thanked one of its staff correspondents.

The department has taken no action against the Metropolitan Magazine.

With respect to this magazine, the incident referred to by Mr. Roosevelt occurred after the magazine had passed through the mails and not a copy offered for mailing failed of transmission. The facts with respect to this matter were made public in a statement by the Solicitor, which appeared in the morning papers of March 10. Mr. Roosevelt's contention that the Metropolitan Magazine was injured from that incident is unfortunate. It can not be said that the magazine lost sales on that account at that time. On the contrary, more copies of the March issue were sold on account of the publicity given the matter. The injury, therefore, must have followed as a result of public disapproval of the matter contained in that issue. I have yet to learn of a patriotic reader, unless it be Mr. Roosevelt, who approved the publication in that issue of the article "Is America Honest?" by William Hard. This department received a large number of letters from widely separated sections of the country characterizing the publication of the "Hard" article as bad from every viewpoint. Some claimed it was unpatriotic, others that it violated the espionage act, and still others that it was treasonable.

If Mr. Roosevelt means that I should repair the injury (?) to the magazine by joining him in commending the "Hard" article as desirable literature for forwarding the war aims of the Government, I can not accommodate him.

I am reliably informed that Germany highly appreciates the Hard article—so highly, in fact, that her propagandists have translated it into German, Spanish, Portuguese, and the Scandinavian languages and are now flooding Mexico, South America, and other countries with copies of it. Mr. Roosevelt could hardly add to the injurious effects of this article should he now have it reproduced in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in full, with its disgusting illustrations accompanied by his express approval, thus giving it free and unlimited distribution.

So much for Mr. Roosevelt's first charge. Now what of his second?

The press of every complexion should always have the widest latitude for criticism of the acts of all public officials. This principle is constantly kept in mind in the administration of the espionage act and disposing of complaints made thereunder.

The Post Office Department has received possibly more complaints from the public alleging that Mr. Roosevelt's articles were in violation of the espionage act than it has against the Hearst newspapers. No matter published by either Mr. Roosevelt or Mr. Hearst has come to my attention which, in my opinion, warranted action by the Post Office Department under the espionage act against either of them.

All but two of the articles in the Hearst papers referred to by Mr. Roosevelt were published before the passage of the espionage act (June 15, 1917), and some of them before our entry into the war. The Post Office Department can hardly be expected even by Mr. Roosevelt to take action against a paper for the publication of matter which was printed and circulated before the passage of the law. The two articles specifically mentioned appeared in the New York American of July 27 and November 22, 1917. Mr. Roosevelt is not a lawyer, and however one may disagree with these two articles, it is confidently asserted that if Mr. Roosevelt had advised with a lawyer of even second-rate ability, he would have been told nothing could be found in these articles in violation of the espionage act.

Mr. Hearst, through his vast newspaper circulation and writing along lines familiar to the public, and Mr. Roosevelt, with the prestige of an ex-President of the United States, writing along entirely different but equally well-known lines, have each said things, whatever the motive, that a casual reader might believe were in conflict with the espionage act. But those whose responsibility it is to enforce this law do not believe a case could be made to stand against either of them in the courts.

The law must be administered as it is found. Any layman can read the facts as stated in the opinion of the court in the department's case against Watson's paper, "The Jeffersonian" (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 22, 1917), and see that it was very different from Mr. Roosevelt's case against Mr. Hearst.

If Mr. Roosevelt means to intimate that I was instrumental, directly or indirectly, in obtaining for Mr. Hearst, or any company or association with which he is connected, a restoration of news or cable facilities which had been withdrawn from him by the allied governments, he is in error. I will say further, I know of no one who performed such a service for him.

As to the telegram to Mr. Arthur Brisbane—I quote from Mr. Roosevelt:

"Mr. Burleson says of Mr. Hearst's alter ego that he 'congratulates the people of Chicago because they are to have the benefit of Mr. Brisbane's able and unselfish efforts for justice and freedom and true democratic government.'"

The telegram sent was as follows:

"From press reports I note that you are to be the editor of the New Herald and Examiner, and I congratulate the people of Chicago that they are to have the benefit of your able and unselfish efforts in furtherance of the progress of the city and the development of the new paper, and I indulge the hope that it will always stand for justice, freedom, and the principles of true democratic government."

However this telegram may have been handled or whatever its effects, the purpose in sending it was far from that charged by Mr. Roosevelt.

In conclusion, to those who have the will to launch assaults against public officials who are discharging their duty, I commend a careful reading of the eighth stanza in Tennyson's "The Grandmother."

Mr. LEWIS subsequently said: Mr. President, this morning there was put into the RECORD a statement of Col. Roosevelt upon a public matter. In reply to that there was something from the Postmaster General, which was put into the RECORD. Both referred, however, to a statement of Mr. Hearst. Might I ask at this time, sir, that the statement of Mr. Hearst be also put in the RECORD along with this same matter? I neglected to ask it this morning, being busy in a committee. I thank the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] for permitting me to interrupt the proceedings at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). The Senate hears the request of the Senator from Illinois for unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the paper referred to by him. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator does not ask that it be read?

Mr. LEWIS. Not that it be read; I do not desire for it to take any time at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not object, in view of the fact that the other two papers have been placed in the RECORD, but I am going to express the hope that the incident is closed.

Mr. LEWIS. I think the Senator from New Hampshire accurately states the matter, that this does close it so far as the RECORD is concerned, and it is to be hoped so far as the public is concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, permission to insert in the RECORD the matter referred to by the Senator from Illinois is given.

The matter referred to is as follows:

MR. HEARST'S CRITICAL ANALYSIS OF MR. ROOSEVELT AND HIS POLITICAL PURPOSES.

MOUNT CLEMENS, MICH., May 13.

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK AMERICAN:

Mr. Roosevelt, though notably less able and less respectable, is emphatically the Asquith of American politics. He is out of power, and he is greedily eager to get back into power, and he does not scruple at any methods, no matter how unfair to the administration or how harmful to the country, in order to accomplish his purely selfish political purposes.

The attack which Mr. Roosevelt now makes upon the administration is just as baseless as the attack which Asquith made upon Lloyd-George, and it will prove to be just as futile in its effect upon the administration and just as fatal in its effect upon Mr. Roosevelt.

The immediate causes of Mr. Roosevelt's present outburst are two in number.

The first cause is the fact that the magazine which hires Mr. Roosevelt at $1 per word to make vicious attacks upon the Government of the United States during war time was excluded from the mails in one issue for a wholly false and absolutely unjustified attack upon the President of the United States and the diplomacy of the United States, calculated to bring our Government and our people into contempt and consequently to injure our cause.

Mr. Roosevelt did not write this particular article, but it is conceivable that any menace to the existence of a magazine which pays so liberally for political slander arouses a natural concern on the part of Mr. Roosevelt for his own profitable, if not patriotic, contract.

The second cause of Mr. Roosevelt's immediate agitation is the fact that the small and lonely New York newspaper, which is supporting Mr. Roosevelt's perpetual aspirations for the Presidency, was recently rebuked as a public enemy by the representative of the United States Government for printing as news certain articles which had no foundation in fact, and which discredited the officers of the United States Army and held them up to ridicule and contumely without the slightest basis of truth or justice in the allegations.

GOVERNMENT LENIENT WITH ROOSEVELT.

In any other country in the world, in critical war times, traitorous publications like Mr. Roosevelt's magazine and Mr. Roosevelt's newspaper, whose only objects in printing falsehood were petty political spite against the President and partisan support of the aspirations of a rival candidate, would have been wholly suppressed as treasonable.

Our Government, however, is lenient with such offending publications and with Mr. Roosevelt himself, because the administration properly believes that in a republic the right of free speech and free publication should be preserved, even though there be occasional disloyal abuses of this right, as in the case of Mr. Roosevelt and the magazine which hires him and the newspaper which politically supports him.

That the United States Government was entirely right in its denunciation of Mr. Roosevelt's New York newspaper was conclusively proven in the suit which arose out of the resignation from that newspaper of its editor, Mr. Frank H. Simonds, well known throughout this country for his patriotic articles on the war.

INVENTED NEWS AND CONCOCTED CABLES.

Mr. Simonds definitely stated and showed that his desire to retire from this disloyal paper was due to the fact that this paper habitually invented news and concocted cables in its own office for the purpose of manufacturing false material with which to attack the Government of the United States and the Army of the United States for small and selfish political purposes.

Of course, Mr. Simonds would not willingly remain connected with any disloyal publication, no matter how profitable that connection might be, but there is apparently nothing in Mr. Roosevelt's make-up to prevent his connection with any publication, no matter how traitorous, as long as that connection will serve to line his purse and further his unscrupulous methods of promoting his personal political aspirations.

Mr. Roosevelt's attempted reflections upon the Hearst publications are unimportant.

HEARST PAPERS ALWAYS CONSTRUCTIVE.

It is sufficient to say in reply that whatever criticism the Hearst publications indulged in was constructive criticism, founded upon established fact, not upon manufactured falsehood, and intended for the information and assistance of the administration and not for its discomfiture and destruction.

For years the Hearst publications have advocated preparedness and have been denounced as jingoes by the shortsighted for doing so.

For years these publications have advocated the extension of West Point and Annapolis and the establishment of national universities throughout the country to provide trained officers for the Army and Navy in time of need.

For years these publications have advocated the construction of the greatest Navy in the world, and the creation of a nationally owned merchant marine to act as an auxiliary Navy in time of war.

Ever since the beginning of the European war the Hearst publications have advocated universal service, and I personally went to Washington and wrote in the Washington Post a signed article appealing to my former associates in Congress to vote for universal service and at least make our own country safe for democracy.

NEED FOR IMMENSE EFFORT FOR DEFENSE.

Ever since the beginning of this European war the Hearst publications have dilated upon the formidableness of the German military machine, and the necessity for immediate and immense effort on the part of our country if we were to defend ourselves against that machine and eventually to overwhelm it.

If the advice of the Hearst publications had been taken we would be applying to-day in a determining way the supreme force which the President now calls for, and we would be winning to-day the glorious victory which we will assuredly win in due time anyway, in spite of delays, in spite of obstacles, in spite of partisan obstruction, and in spite of treacherous attacks in the rear by selfish politicians animated by personal ambitions.

Let me say in conclusion that the attack upon the administration and the incidental attack upon the Hearst publications, which are only seeking to secure justice for the administration, emanate from the reactionary influences of Wall Street.

MR. ROOSEVELT'S SINISTER SUPPORTERS.

The New York Tribune, which supports Mr. Roosevelt in his unpatriotic activities, is owned by the Mills and Reid estates, two of the greatest and most sinister of New York financial forces, and not even wholly American in character, as the Mills and Reid families are both intermarried with the English aristocracy.

The Metropolitan Magazine, which hires Mr. Roosevelt at a dollar a word, as professional vituperator of the President, is owned by the Whitney estate, which is administered by Harry Payne Whitney, grandson of Henry B. Payne, the Standard Oil magnate, and son of William C. Whitney, the New York traction magnate.

Nor is it unusual to find Mr. Roosevelt in such company or in the financial favor of such influences.

Mr. Roosevelt in 1912 ran for President as the candidate of the Steel Trust and to defeat Mr. Taft, who had prosecuted the Steel Trust.

Mr. Roosevelt was financed by Mr. Perkins, of the Steel Trust, and when Mr. Perkins, of the Steel Trust, refused to finance Mr. Roosevelt and his party in 1916, Mr. Roosevelt shamefully betrayed his Progressive Party into the hands of the reactionary Republicans.

ROOSEVELT INSTRUMENT OF STEEL TRUST.

Mr. Roosevelt has always been a badly camouflaged instrument of these sinister financial interests from the time that he personally, as President, allowed the United States Steel Corporation, in flagrant violation of the antitrust laws of the Nation, to absorb the Tennessee Coal & Iron Co., down to the time of the recent election in New York City, when he followed the lead of the Steel Trust and the Standard Oil Trust and declared against the nominee of his own party who had been regularly nominated by the Republican voters in the open primary, which Mr. Roosevelt had always advocated.

As Mr. Roosevelt and his unfounded allegations were overwhelmingly repudiated in the New York City election and as Mr. Asquith and his unfounded allegations were overwhelmingly repudiated in the House of Commons, so Mr. Roosevelt and every political and public traitor should be overwhelmingly repudiated whenever such a one sets himself disloyally against his constituted leaders and against the best interests of his country for the meanest of all motives, petty jealousy and personal gain.

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST.

RENT PROFITEERING IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I was visited this morning by the president and, I think, one of the other officers of the Real Estate Brokers' Association here, and they gave me a copy of a resolution relating to the matter of rent profiteering and colorable sales, expressing a desire for an investigation in regard to the matter, and asked me to present the resolution to the Senate.

I think it is very proper to present the resolution to the Senate, but I expressly stated to them that I did not wish to imply that I would take any part or take any time for an investigation of the conditions to which the resolution relates.

The investigation already made by the District Committee has satisfied me, as it did the other members of the committee, and I thought pretty fairly satisfied the Senate, that the conditions regarding rent profiteering in the District were such that the thing for Congress now to do was to take action to prevent it. I stated that with that understanding I would present this resolution. I send it to the desk and ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The following resolution was offered and carried unanimously at a meeting of the executive committee of the Real Estate Brokers' Association Thursday, May 23, 1918:

"Whereas charges have been indiscriminately circulated in both Houses of Congress and in the public press of the Capital City to the effect that the real estate owners and agents of Washington are profiteering and making 'colorable' sales of their property; and

"Whereas the Real Estate Brokers' Association of Washington, D. C., after an investigation, is satisfied that said real estate owners and agents are not guilty of the charges made; and

"Whereas said agents are unwilling to rest under these baseless and scandalous charges: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we, the members of the Real Estate Brokers' Association, reposing an abiding faith in the fairness of the Congress and its constituent Members, respectfully ask for a congressional investigation of the charges made, holding itself and the real estate brokers forming the association ready to produce such testimony, data, records, and books as may be needful to thoroughly ventilate the questions at issue; be it further

"Resolved, That the investigations requested be instituted at the earliest possible moment."

CHAS. W. FAIRFAX, President.
HERBERT T. SHANNON, Vice President.
CHAS. S. SHREVE, Secretary.
ALGERNON S. GARDINER, Treasurer.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I assured these gentlemen that, so far as lay in the power of the District of Columbia Committee, with which I have been connected, as near exact justice in all cases brought to their attention would be looked after as could be brought about by general laws; that the conditions which we had found to exist here were not unusual in the world at the present time; that laws have been passed governing many cases in Great Britain and in many of the British colonies, and those laws have from time to time been amended as conditions were found which required amendment to prevent or to produce nearer justice in all cases; and while no one could undertake to present a completed scheme covering the cases which had been uncovered in this city with respect to rent profiteering, yet they could be assured that it would only be a short time, if they could present cases of sufficient hardship which seemed to be of a general character, before Congress would remedy such legislation as it started in this matter by amending the law.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. May I ask the Senator——

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment, I will then yield to him.

In connection with this same matter I received this morning a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Navy describing the conditions, stating that the conditions in this city were very injuriously affecting the personnel of that department. It seems to me that when a great department of the Government located in the city calls attention to a matter of this kind the letter from the Acting Secretary should also be presented, and I ask that the Secretary may read this letter from Acting Secretary Roosevelt.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 23, 1918.

Hon. WILLARD SAULSBURY,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The great unrest among civilian employees of the department caused by attempts at rent profiteering is seriously interfering with their efficiency, and I consider it very important that immediate relief should be given by the enactment of Senate joint resolution 152 or some similar measure.

Sincerely, yours,
FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
Acting Secretary.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will yield the floor if the Senator from Michigan desires it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not wish to take the Senator from the floor.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have no desire to continue.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want to ask him if the whole theory of this legislation is not predicated upon the unjust exactions of the real estate brokers of Washington. If that is true, and they deny that their conduct is subject to criticism, it seems to me they ought to have an opportunity to be heard and that the request they make for an inquiry is a very proper and appropriate one.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If they had not been heard, and if this effort was being made without their knowledge, undoubtedly I would think they should be heard. But as a matter of fact, if not every real estate owner, certainly gentlemen representing all their associations, and many individual real estate owners have already been heard, and their testimony is in print as taken before the District of Columbia Committee, and can be readily referred to.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not wish to be put in the attitude of being a special defender of the real estate brokers. I have very little in common with them.

Mr. SAULSBURY. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment to ask that the only thing the real estate brokers seem to be charged with is being the nucleus for the formation of a combination in this matter. Of course, the offices of the real estate brokers, the renting agents, and the real estate dealers are the places where the owners who want to rent or sell would naturally congregate. In that way they have become the centers of the effort of the people who are endeavoring to raise rents in a general sort of way. I do not undertake to accuse anyone especially. I do not think there is a general combination of them.

The proposed law is not directed at the real estate brokers. It is directed at the real estate owners and whoever may represent them.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not want to let the opportunity go by without saying that I think the remedy proposed by the joint resolution now in conference will not meet the situation at all, that it will tend to restrict the building of new residences and apartments and that it will operate to so curtail the facilities so much needed by the large influx of new employees here as to make the situation much more embarrassing and difficult than it would be without that legislation.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I may express the hope, Mr. President, that the Senator will read the testimony which was taken by the District Committee in connection with all these matters.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire particularly, if the Senator will pardon me a moment, to call attention to the fact that there is no building going on in Washington now except the finishing of contracts. The reason for that is obvious. The conditions do not permit the obtaining of material to carry out any extensive contracts. So far as hindering the construction of new buildings under private auspices I think that is entirely negligible absolutely. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator about the testimony to which he refers. In his statement he refers to the testimony of real estate owners, as I understood him.

Mr. SAULSBURY. There are a number of them who gave testimony.

Mr. NORRIS. The resolution the Senator presented comes from real estate brokers. Did the brokers testify before the committee?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think very largely. Most of the important real estate agents of the city of Washington were before the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. The owners were also there and their testimony appears of record?

Mr. SAULSBURY. There were many owners there. Of course, as there are thousands and thousands of owners in Washington, the testimony of all of them was not taken.

Mr. NORRIS. The testimony was taken before the committee reported the joint resolution, which is now in conference?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes; and the testimony is printed.

Mr. NORRIS. I presume then it was the conclusion of the committee, since they reported the joint resolution after hearing the testimony, that rent profiteering was taking place.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It was the conclusion of every member of the committee. The action was unanimous in reporting the bill which came over from the House, or rather the Pomerene amendment to the Johnson bill, and also instructing the presentation of the joint resolution to cover the immediate present.

Mr. NORRIS. So, after hearing the testimony the committee unanimously agreed to the bill and also the joint resolution as necessary to save the situation?

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator precisely states the condition.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, in relation to this matter I have received several letters from citizens in this District. They are all three of them short, and I should like to have the Secretary read them now in order that the Senate may have the advantage of the views presented. One is an owner, another is a real estate agent, and a third is a real estate brokers' association. They look at this matter from different standpoints and give different arguments. I think they are all interesting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, May 24, 1918.

Senator F. B. BRANDEGEE,
1321 K Street, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: My brother has just put up to me, on the rent-profiteering proposition, the fact that 11 out of his 18 tenants who have leases on his apartments sublet their apartments. Some never even moved in, and nearly all live elsewhere in town. It is quite evident from the copies of the subtenants' leases, which he secured from the real estate agents, that there was and is profiteering in rentals in this building.

Is it Senator SAULSBURY'S idea that these people who do not occupy their leased apartments shall go on leasing from him and subletting at present profiteering figures? What he wants to do is to rent directly to the man who is going to live there and not to some one who sees a sure profit in his lease.

During this agitation he has been subjected to undeserved criticism by people not conversant with the facts, while the actual causes of the criticism have gone scot free and pocketed their profits.

As a matter of fact, he began his building in the spring of 1916, before we thought of war being brought home to us, on a regularly planned income scheme of rentals. He adhered to this strictly, although when the tenants moved in on November 1, 1917, the demand was on and the opportunity for greater rentals made easy.

If the Saulsbury resolution would suspend subletting during the war, it would open up nearly 50 per cent of this building to bona fide tenants and cut out profiteering, instead of further legalizing present profiteering by providing that "existing leases shall be continued to their present terms." These subletting conditions must prevail generally if one apartment house shows such a large percentage.

It would be better to provide that the lease of any Government employee shall automatically terminate on two weeks' notice if his work takes him and his family away from Washington and he expresses the wish to cancel the lease on the grounds that neither he nor his family have any further use for it.

The landlord can easily fill his place nowadays. The resolution already arranges that any new tenant shall pay the same as the old tenant. This would work very satisfactorily for the Government employee, because his responsibility for rent would terminate with his vacation of the premises for work elsewhere than in Washington. The subletting clause, which he permitted, protects the Government employee when his services are required elsewhere, but if the resolution provides that things shall stay as they are the profiteering will still go on, and henceforth the congressional approval.

Is there a chance for anything to be done about this so late in the day?

Yours, sincerely, ——— ———.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have not put that gentleman's name in because it is a personal letter to me, but I vouch for his large interests in Washington and his character and integrity.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like if agreeable to the Senator from Connecticut to comment on the letter just read at this time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly, provided the Senator will let the other two letters be read afterwards.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Of course, I have no desire to stop any one, but it seemed to me when that letter is read in regard to subletting it might be well to say that of course no law is necessary to prevent subletting unless the landlord consents, if the lease is properly drawn. Personally, I never knew a lease of real estate or any portion of it properly drawn which did not require the consent of the landlord to any subletting. So the remedy is entirely in the hands of the landlord.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But, if the Senator will permit me to interrupt him there, this is a case where the subleases have already been made and the subtenants are in possession, and under the Senator's resolution they have been guaranteed to stay in possession at exorbitant rents to the original lessee and can not be evicted.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Until——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Until after the war.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Or until proper legislation is enacted by Congress. The Senator, of course, will understand that it is impossible in the form of a joint resolution to provide for a great many cases of hardship. I may say that I think one of the great troubles in this city is due to the greed of the original lessee in subletting to other people.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That can be attended to. There should be no complaint on the part of the landlord if he assents to it and he thereby mixes himself in with the second contract subletting.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, if the landlord allows a tenant to sublet, he does not necessarily know what his tenant is going to get, and he is not to be considered necessarily as the guilty party in the profiteering.

Mr. SAULSBURY. No; but that is in many cases what they are complaining of——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That may be so.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That somebody else is getting money for their property which does not come into their pockets.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But what I desire to suggest to the Senator is this: The Senator says that all these cases that his joint resolution does not provide for, all these cases of injustice that we clearly see will probably be worked by its adoption, are to be corrected by future legislation. They may be, and they may not be; but it seems to me that while the subject is before Congress the time is now to provide for all such cases as are brought to our attention which we think need to be provided for; not to dismiss the subject, and then get into a log jam of business here so that we can never take it up again.

It seems to me this joint resolution is the one upon which we should perfect this whole matter.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I can assure the Senator that it is quite the desire of the committee that that should be done; but it is manifest that this sort of legislation can not now be perfected, and probably will not be perfected for some time, until the legislation which we shall get through in the form of the so-called Pomerene bill shall have been tried for some months, and whatever difficulties shall have then shown themselves will be corrected.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE I now ask that the other two communications be read, if the Senator from Texas desires to address himself to the subject matter.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I simply want to ask the Senator from Delaware a question in this connection. Is it not true that all contracts of lease contain a clause that a sublease can not be made without the consent of the lessor?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have never seen a properly drawn lease that did not require the consent of the landlord to subletting; and I think they all do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 23, 1918.

Senator BRANDEGEE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I wish you would read the inclosed copy of a letter addressed to Senator SAULSBURY. This is not theory, but a practical example of what would be the effects of his resolution.

Yours, very truly,

J. P. STORY, Jr.

MAY 22, 1918.

Hon. WILLARD SAULSBURY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: You will possibly recall my telephone conversation with you in respect to your resolution suspending the due processes of law for the recovery of possession of real estate. I asked that so-called "business property" be exempted. Your reply was that the resolution was interim legislation, pending action on the profiteering bill.

As passed by the House, your resolution may now suspend these processes for 30 days, for 30 months, or for 30 years—no one knows. The Government can have no interest, or the public for that matter, in the relations between landlord and tenant as respects "business property." I am speaking especially of stores, and a little thought must surely convince anyone of this fact.

The merchants of Washington to-day are reaping profits undreamed of before. The number of their customers has greatly increased, and the volume in dollars very much more proportionately. The merchants have curtailed expenses in delivery, curtailed credits, and generally are making net profits greatly in excess of former years.

Your resolution prevents the holder of business property to measure the value of his property by the measure of value that it is to its occupant, and it merely increases the profits of the user.

However, the greatest evil, and, in justice, it amounts to an evil, is the sweeping manner in which the resolution has ignored actual conditions in the real estate business. Much business real estate in all cities, and particularly in Washington, in recent years has been rented temporarily at nominal rentals to tide over vacancies between permanent tenants. Also, some very valuable business properties, not entirely improved, are rented at low rentals on short-term leases pending the opportunity to rebuild with modern improvements.

The House resolution will continue indefinitely the income loss by the owner of these properties; furthermore, will prevent the improvement of the properties, and, therefore, of the city; the only result will play into the hands of present tenants already paying a wholly inadequate return.

I have in mind several leases of property under these conditions. One is rented at $100 per month, by the month, and appraised by the assessors at over $110,000. The owner is actually at a loss for expenses and taxes on this property. He has an offer to lease it at something over $7,000 per year. The resolution, if passed, would prevent his getting possession. This is only an example; I can cite you many similar cases.

Should your resolution go through in any form, in simple justice I urge that it be amended so that upon the expiration of existing leases, if tenants avail themselves of the immunities of your resolution, that they will not be entitled to such immunity, unless they will agree to pay a rent that will equal 7 per cent net, allowed by the Pomerene bill.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN P. STORY, Jr.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I merely wish to call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to this matter. That is about the sort of complaint or kind of letter that one gets from everybody who has any special case which he thinks ought to be remedied; and there are, of course, many of them. The only thing that we can attempt to do is to deal with the generality of cases, and when it comes to providing for fair rents the Pomerene bill will do that; there is no doubt about it. As soon as we can get that bill through—and it is now in conference, or it has been returned to the other House for the appointment of conferees—this whole subject can be attended to comprehensively. My suggestion about the matter is that this is attempting to put the cart before the horse.

I desire only to add that I hope that Senators will understand that the standpoint I take in this matter is that there is no particular sanctity about real estate over any other property. Every State in the Union, I presume, has laws against usury. Those laws allow a man to obtain so much in the way of gain or increase from the use which he allows another man to have of the money which he is able to loan him on such security or in any form that he desires. For the most part I suppose it will approximate 6 per cent throughout the country. The different State laws provide different penalties. My theory about this rent resolution, and the one that appealed to me most strongly, is that such conditions have come to this District that we are called upon to prohibit rack-renting—what is known here as rent profiteering—in the same way that in the history of the legislation of English-speaking peoples it has been found necessary to prohibit the man who has money to lend from squeezing the poor fellow who needs the money.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I agree entirely with the Senator that rack-renting or excessive profiteering in real estate, certainly at this time, is worse than usury; but in order to correct usury or rack-renting it is not necessary to leap into confiscation.

The instance just cited in the letter which has been read is a case of confiscation. The writer cites a case, and says he knows of several others, where a man owning a building worth $100,000, which he has rented for $100 a month, simply to get what he could out of it to help pay the taxes and insurance—a piece of business property, not a residence property at all, in connection with which anybody could be deprived of shelter or lodging—is now offered $7,000 a year for it in the open market. It is worth that; but under this bill the tenant who is getting it for $1,200 a year is to keep it during the war, although in the market it is worth $7,000 a year, and the owner, who has been out the interest and taxes on it for years, now that it has become legitimately worth $7,000 a year, is to be prohibited from recouping his losses. I do not consider that to be fair; it does not seem to me to be an extravagant suggestion to say that, even in this joint resolution, at this time, without waiting to see whether the so-called Pomerene bill can secure the assent of both branches of Congress at this busy session, we could exempt business property.

Mr. SAULSBURY. May I address a question to the Senator?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I assume, of course, that the Senator does not think that because temporarily a man may be deprived of getting the full rental value of his property—and there is no desire on the part of anybody to prevent him from getting a reasonable rental for his property—until we can correct that—and we can not do it now by this joint resolution, because the joint resolution has been agreed upon in conference—that hundreds and possibly thousands of people should be turned out of their homes by rack renters and rent profiteers.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not object at all to a resolution going through which would continue the status quo during this session of Congress, provided other legislation on the subject is passed.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I can assure the Senator that it is the desire of the committee that such legislation shall be passed; but, of course, he knows quite as well as anyone else that we can not control the form in which finished legislation is finally enacted by Congress.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know the Senator can not, and he can not control the action of Congress, and yet he is asking us to adopt what he admits to be a defective piece of legislation, which does not comprehend numerous classes of exceptional cases, in the expectation merely that later something better will be passed at this session; but if it is not passed, then the joint resolution stands. I wish to say, Mr. President, that the Senator——

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment. The Senator must realize that his joint resolution is not for a stated period. While we hope this war will be over in a year, it may go on for 10 or 20 years. There was a thirty years' war once in Europe.

Mr. GALLINGER. And a hundred years' war.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; a hundred years' war in Holland. What I want to suggest to the Senator is this: We passed through the Judiciary Committee, and subsequently passed through Congress, if I remember correctly, legislation preventing the collection of debts, the issuance of judicial decrees of foreclosure, and so forth, against soldiers who are in the Army in the service abroad. It was said that it was unconstitutional; that contention was vigorously made by several members of the committee; and it was only justified in our judgment upon the theory, based upon a decision of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court, that the remedy could be postponed for a reasonable time; but to say that during the period of the war, which is perfectly indefinite and may be 50 years, is a reasonable time to deprive a man of his property it seems to me is to go against every notion of a man's right in this country.

Now I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I only wanted to say when the Senator said the legislation was admittedly defective, that that admission goes to this extent only—and the same admission must apply to any piece of legislation that is proposed—that undoubtedly cases will arise, no matter what the legislation is and no matter what is proposed, where individual hardship will be worked; but it is for the benefit of the generality of people that legislation of this kind is primarily enacted. The Senator is so good a lawyer that I am sure he knows that in the history of the legislation of the English-speaking race equity courts have had to be instituted from time to time for the correction of those defects in the law which worked injustices to the individual, the remedy for which theretofore had been in the king's conscience. We will have to continue to legislate to correct defects. Every country in the world that has instituted legislation of this kind has found defects to be subsequently corrected.

I do not profess to be superior to all the minds that are opposed to the proposed legislation; but I have studied the legislation of England and the British colonies. This measure is intended to provide, and was intended to provide when introduced, for a temporary condition. I do not propose to admit that this legislation is defective further than that it may work a few cases of individual hardship as against many cases of hardship which will be remedied. I think it is the best we have been able to originate.

I will say to the Senator, if he will pardon me further, that this joint resolution was debated in the Senate quite generally, and the Senate had an opportunity to amend it. We have now gotten as far as the conference committee, and the conference committee report will be submitted. There is, of course, an end of amending proposed legislation, and that is the condition in this instance. I know that if the Senator will prepare a joint resolution or prepare the form of a bill which will provide against any injustice that he can see in such legislation as this, the committee will gladly report in favor of it, and gladly assist him in getting it through.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator talks about courts of equity being instituted to relieve the rigors of the common law. Of course that is well known; but the Senator is proposing a measure which, if adopted, is accompanied by no court of equity to relieve its injustices and its rigors.

The Senator talks about particular cases, and says it is impossible to provide for every particular case. It appears from the letter of Mr. Story, written to the Senator on the 19th of May, five or six days ago, while this measure was before the conference committee, that the writer of the letter did not ask the Senator to look after a particular case, but asked him to look after an entire class of property in the city of Washington, to wit, business property as distinguished from residence property.

The Senator says it is beyond the power of the Senate to amend the joint resolution that is before the Senate, and asks that another resolution be prepared to provide for a great class of cases which surely should not be ignored. The entire business property of this great city of Washington is subject to the provisions of the joint resolution. That class of property ought not to be included; and the report ought to be recommitted, in my opinion, inasmuch as simply one sentence would cure the whole defect. Yet we are asked to rush this measure through now, and take the chance that somebody else will prepare some other legislation to cure what is a manifest and grave defect in the conference report.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator, of course, is aware that we are not considering the conference report now.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. We are not considering it, and the discussion is all out of order, except by unanimous consent; I understand that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut if the instance referred to by Mr. Story concerns property needed by the Government for governmental purposes?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know nothing about it; I never said a word to him; I simply received that letter.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Evidently it does not, but I did not know but that the Senator knew.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; I do not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If it does not concern property that the Government wants, and that could be taken in an orderly way, to deprive the owner of it, or to attempt to do so, would not stand at all, and ought not to stand.

I want to make this observation, and then I am through. I do not believe we are going to get any legislation except this joint resolution, and the moment that the joint resolution is passed it will tie the thing up so close that the advocates of the measure will be perfectly satisfied, and I do not believe we are going to get any further legislation at all. Perhaps I am wrong about that, but there is an attitude of absolute hostility to it in the committee, as every Senator knows.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, if this joint resolution is passed and any other corrective legislation designed to eliminate some of the provisions in this joint resolution is attempted, it will undoubtedly be met with the most vigorous resistance from the people who will be profiting unduly by the operations of this joint resolution.

Now, I ask that the other letter be read. I have been interrupted a great deal; I did not intend to take so much time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

REAL ESTATE BROKERS ASSOCIATION
OF WASHINGTON CITY, D. C.,
Office of the President, 1312 New York Avenue, May 23, 1918.

Hon. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
Senate Office Building, City.

DEAR SENATOR BRANDEGEE: The Saulsbury antieviction resolution, as amended by the House, is unfair and inequitable to tenants as well as owners. It should never be enacted into law as permanent legislation for several reasons.

1. It fails to reach the evil complained of.
2. It does not undo any existing profiteering but continues it, nor does it prohibit future profiteering.
3. It penalizes the patriotic owners, who have not raised rentals, although they may be paying 100 per cent more for maintenance charges.
4. It encourages subletting at high prices, as original tenants will voluntarily pay increased rentals to owners for the privilege of subletting.
5. It places no restriction on rentals for vacant quarters, which will destroy uniformity of sums paid by tenants.
6. It closes temporary available rental space, such as rooms, apartments, and houses, that will not be offered the public, because possession can not be regained by owners during the war and a year thereafter.
7. It does not abate notices of eviction for selling, as 95 per cent of all sales are to home buyers.
8. It prevents the development for housing and office purposes of large sites now used as gasoline stations, insanitary dwellings, and shops.
9. It justifies owners selling, rather than renting on an unprofitable basis.
10. It jeopardizes the majority of owners who have mortgaged properties because a restricted market will hold down prices at private and public sale.
11. It injures the value of estates (beneficiaries being minors, lunatics, etc.) when sales must be made to pay legacies and to make distributions among heirs.

Very truly, yours, CHAS. W. FAIRFAX, President.

Mr. SAULSBURY. May I say just a word in regard to that, Mr. President? It reminds me very much of the man who was charged with keeping a rabid dog, which bit somebody. He gave possibly 11 reasons, as the real estate men have done; or it may have been 111. He said no man had been bitten, that the dog was not there, and went on with the other 109 reasons, and wound up finally by saying that he had never owned a dog. [Laughter.] Now, I have no doubt that these real estate men could have added a hundred other reasons and had 111 or made them less, if they had wanted to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question? I will take but a moment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Perhaps I have not been as diligent as I ought to have been in analyzing the joint resolution. Does the joint resolution put business property upon the same basis as residence property? That is to say, does it provide that the owners of business property shall not charge more than they charged on a date mentioned in the joint resolution?

Mr. SAULSBURY. There is no date mentioned in the joint resolution, but there is no distinction at all as between the different kinds of property, and tenants are continued at the same rent. It is practically a tenants' moratorium. That is the effect of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was requested by a friend three or four days ago to find two small rooms, if I could, in some business building in Washington, he desiring to occupy them. I have attempted it in five different buildings, and there is not a room to be secured. Under those circumstances, where the demand exceeds the supply, does the Senator think it right to say that those people shall not increase the rent at all?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think they should be limited in the amount of rent which they receive from their property, and that all of them should be. The men who have increased the rents have brought about this condition; and I think the time has come in this city when the renting of real estate must be regulated in the same way that the loaning of money is regulated here and everywhere else in the country.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this joint resolution continues a rent that may have been fair a year ago and may be unfair to-day; and to undertake to say to the owners of a building where the demand for rooms is greater than the supply that no increase whatever shall be allowed is to my mind an absolute and cruel injustice.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is confiscation.

Mr. ASHURST. I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is the presentation of petitions and memorials. The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House insists upon its amendment to the bill (S. 4482) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended, disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SIMS, Mr. RAYBURN, and Mr. ESCH managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8764) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the admission of the State of Illinois into the Union.

The message further announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 152) to prevent rent profiteering in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10854) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PADGETT, Mr. TALBOTT, Mr. RIORDAN, Mr. BUTLER, and Mr. BROWNING managers at the conference on the part of the House.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. OVERMAN. At a meeting of the Equal Suffrage League, of Greensboro, N. C., the following resolution was passed in favor of the Federal suffrage amendment and protesting at the delay in the passage of the resolution in the Senate and urging its immediate passage. I ask that the resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GREENSBORO, N. C. May 23, 1918.

Senator OVERMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: A meeting of the Greensboro, N. C., Equal Suffrage League was held on the evening of May 22, at which the following resolution was passed.

We ask that you give the matter your earnest consideration.

Will you kindly read our resolution into the RECORD.

Sincerely, yours,

Mrs. MARY B. CRAWFORD, Secretary.

Resolution.

Since the principle of democracy, for which we are engaged in war against autocratic Germany, includes the equal enfranchisement of women and men, and the President of the United States, supported by the national executive committees of the Democratic and Republican Parties, believing in this truth, has declared in favor of the Federal suffrage amendment, and our allies, Great Britain and Canada, have enfranchised their women as a war measure, thus giving us second place in the realization of democratic principles: Be it therefore

Resolved, That the suffragists of Greensboro, N. C., protest at the delay in the passage of the Federal suffrage amendment in the Senate of the United States and urge the immediate passage of the suffrage resolution now pending.

Mrs. AL FAIRBROTHER,
Mrs. B. N. MANN,
HARRIET W. ELLIOTT,
Resolution Committee.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I ask unanimous consent to present and have printed in the RECORD a short resolution from the Winona (Miss.) Equal Suffrage League in favor of the constitutional amendment giving women the right to vote. I also present a resolution adopted by the W. R. Barksdale Camp, United Confederate Veterans, of Grenada, Miss., indorsing the resolution. I wish to say, Mr. President, that I would not ask that these resolutions be printed in the RECORD if I were not requested so to do by my constituents.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WINONA, MISS., May 22, 1918.

To the Hon. JAMES K. VARDAMAN,
Senate of the United States:

Whereas the other nations of the world are rapidly enfranchising their women; and

Whereas our Government is calling upon its women to give their all toward a war for democracy, and the call has already found a hearty response; and

Whereas the liquor interests of the United States have come upon the scene, and are now engaged in waging a bitter fight against the suffrage amendment:

Resolved, That we, the members of the Winona Equal Suffrage League, do most earnestly urge you to vote for and use your influence in the passing of the resolution for the enfranchising of the women of the United States, and that these resolutions be read into the Senate record.

LOUISE DUNSTAN, Secretary.

GRENADA, MISS., May 18, 1918.

At the regular meeting of W. R. Barksdale Camp, No. 189, United Confederate Veterans, the following resolution was adopted by rising vote, and a copy ordered sent to the President, Senators, and Representatives:

"Resolved, That we, the Grenada County Confederate Veterans, in annual meeting assembled, do hereby reaffirm and reiterate, that we tender our services to President Wilson in his noble defense of our Government, in the defense of right and justice of humanity, in democratic promises of freedom and liberty against monarchy and the atrociousness of German despotic Kaiserism."

J. W. YOUNG, Commander.
J. W. SHARP, Adjutant.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have a copy of resolutions adopted by the Cotton Exchange and Board of Trade of Augusta, Ga., on the subject of short-line railroads, which they have sent to their Senators and desire to have presented to Congress. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Railroad Commission of the State of Georgia, with commendable initiative and purpose, has called a meeting of all the railroad commissions of the Southeastern States to convene in the city of Atlanta on the 24th day of May, 1918, to confer concerning the threatened disaster that will result to innumerable communities and short-line railroads if the latter, under existing conditions, are excluded from Government operation and control; and

Whereas the Augusta Cotton Exchange and Board of Trade believes that it would be unfair, undemocratic, and destructive of immense property investments, numberless homes, farms, schools, churches, and all that goes to make up the life of many thriving and patriotic communities should the short-line railroads serving said communities be forced by unequal competition with the trunk-line systems under Government operation to go into bankruptcy and ultimately to suspend operation; and

Whereas the Augusta Cotton Exchange and Board of Trade believes that full consideration and publicity should be given to the calamitous results that will inevitably follow the proposed elimination of short-line railroads from Government control, while the trunk-line systems are retained and favored by the financial and routing policies adopted by the Government; and

Whereas the Augusta Cotton Exchange and Board of Trade believes in fair play for the smaller interests of the country as well as the larger ones, and believes in a wise and far-seeing conservation of all our national resources; and

Whereas the Augusta Cotton Exchange and Board of trade is confident that fair and considerate treatment of the short-line railroads and of the communities dependent upon them will be accorded by the Director General of Railroads when the full facts have been presented to his attention: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Augusta Cotton Exchange and Board of Trade commends the action of the Railroad Commission of Georgia in calling a meeting for consideration of this most important matter; that the members of the Augusta Cotton Exchange and Board of Trade, as loyal and patriotic business men interested in the welfare of the country, express it as their conviction that the short-line railroads of the country should be continued under Government operation and control upon a fair basis of compensation so long as the trunk-line systems are likewise operated and controlled by the Government; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the chairman of the Railroad Commission of Georgia, to the Director General of Railroads at Washington, to Representatives of the State of Georgia in the United States Senate, and to the Representative of the tenth congressional district of Georgia in the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to have read the telegram which I send to the desk from the Dallas Equal Suffrage Association.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The telegram will be read.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

DALLAS, TEX., May 24, 1918.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Will you please have read into the RECORD the resolution passed this morning urging an immediate vote on the Federal suffrage amendment. We thank you again for your support and influence.

DALLAS EQUAL SUFFRAGE ASSOCIATION.

Mr. NELSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Minnesota, praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4459) to amend an act entitled

"An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 466) thereon.

ELLA OLIVER RICHARDSON ET AL.

Mr. RANSDELL. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 4068) for the relief of Ella Oliver Richardson and Edmund Richardson, of New Orleans, La. It is a private bill, and it will take about two minutes to pass it. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, does the Senator ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered at this time?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do. It will take but a minute. It is a private bill and is unanimously reported.

Mr. ASHURST. I will not object, then, Mr. President, if it takes no longer than a minute.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not think it will. The bill is very short.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill reported by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 2, line 1, after the word "six," to insert "and ninety one-hundredths"; in line 3, after the word "Louisiana," to insert "approximately five hundred and eighteen and ninety-three hundredths acres"; in the same line, after the word "acre," to strike out "Lands" and insert "lands"; and, in line 6, after the word "years," to insert: "Provided, That proper application for the purchase of these lands be filed hereunder in the district land office within six months from the passage of this act, and that no adverse claim thereto be officially on record as pending when the application is allowed and the sale is made," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to sell and patent to Ella Oliver Richardson and Edmund Richardson the west fractional half of southwest fractional quarter of section 2, 27.24 acres; all fractional section 11, 320 acres; all that part of northeast quarter of northwest quarter section 13 lying west of the eastern boundary of what was formerly section 40, approximately 24.84 acres; northwest quarter of northwest quarter section 27, 39.95 acres; south half of northeast quarter and northwest quarter of northeast quarter section 28, 106.90 acres; all situated in township 18 north, range 10 east, Louisiana meridian, in East Carroll and Madison Parishes, La., approximately 518.93 acres, at $1.25 per acre, lands which they and their grantors have occupied under claim and color of title and open and notorious possession for upward of 50 years: Provided, That proper application for the purchase of these lands be filed hereunder in the district land office within six months from the passage of this act, and that no adverse claim thereto be officially on record as pending when the application is allowed and the sale is made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BLACKFEET RESERVATION, MONT.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask leave to withdraw the report (No. 451) submitted by me from the Committee on Indian Affairs on the bill (S. 4404) repealing that portion of the Indian appropriation act of March 1, 1907 (34 Stat. L., pp. 1015, 1035), which relates to the disposal of the surplus unallotted lands within the Blackfeet Reservation, in Montana, for the purpose of making a correction.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report is withdrawn.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 4605) to protect the insignia of the Young Men's Christian Association, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 4606) to authorize the Secretary of War to exchange certain lands owned by the United States in Monroe County, Pa., for certain other adjacent lands owned by the Monroe Water Supply Co.;

A bill (S. 4607) to amend section 7 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917; and

A bill (S. 4608) to protect the military and naval forces of the United States against venereal diseases, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ASHURST:

A bill (S. 4609) to amend the war-risk insurance act as amended; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. STERLING:

A bill (S. 4610) granting an increase of pension to George C. Stearns; to the Committee on Pensions.

MANUFACTURE OF MALT AND VINOUS LIQUORS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. On yesterday the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products," was received from the House of Representatives and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. The bill contains a limitation on one of the paragraphs of appropriation relating to the use of foodstuffs in the manufacture of beer. It is simply a limitation upon the appropriation. It provides that that appropriation shall not be expended unless the President issues a proclamation under legislation heretofore passed.

I think that is very unwise legislation. In a way I am glad that it was put in the bill, so as to open the field for action by the Senate upon that measure. I wish to offer a proposed amendment to the bill, striking out that condition and inserting a legislative prohibition against the further use of foodstuffs in the manufacture of malt or vinous liquors. I ask that the amendment may be read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. In connection with it I want to read a paragraph from a letter which I have received.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

On page 5, line 5, after "$6,100,000," strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert the following: "From and after 30 days from the date of the approval of this act no foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds shall, during the continuance of the present war, be used in the production of malt or vinous liquors for beverage purposes, and anyone who willfully violates this provision or any rule or regulation made to carry the same into effect shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both."

Mr. JONES of Washington. When this matter was up in the Senate before it was claimed that organized labor was against a provision of that sort. I have here a letter by the editor of the Unionist, a newspaper of Chicago, having a heading, "News of the American Federation of Labor: Social and Industrial Betterment," and so forth, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD. I want to read just a paragraph from the letter to the Senate. It says:

I believe that I speak for an overwhelming majority of labor leaders when I say that in this crisis, when the demand for men to fight and to work is so urgent, that we are opposed to any institution or practice that diverts or cripples labor in the production of nonessentials or that wastes food, fuel, transportation facilities, chemicals, or any other things so necessary for the winning of this war.

Then he calls attention to the use of foodstuffs in the manufacture of beer, and asks that it be prohibited. I ask that this letter be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE UNIONIST,
Chicago, May 21, 1918.

Senator WESLEY L. JONES,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR JONES: When the Nation is at war, patriotic men and women will bend every energy and subordinate every other interest to the winning of the war. This is particularly true in a war such as we now wage for liberty, democracy, and brotherhood.

I believe that I speak for an overwhelming majority of labor leaders when I say that in this crisis, when the demand for men to fight and to work is so urgent, that we are opposed to any institution or practice that diverts or cripples labor in the production of nonessentials, or that wastes food, fuel, transportation facilities, chemicals, or any other things so necessary for the winning of this war.

I need not call your attention to the fact that as a waster the liquor traffic is the chief offender. The more quickly that war-time prohibition can be enacted the more quickly will victory come and peace with its constructive program will be entered upon. I believe you may depend upon labor to back this program loyally.

Most sincerely, yours,

WM. CASTLEMAN, Editor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, does the Senator ask that the letter be referred to the committee also?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, yes. I assume that the letter will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I received a similar letter from the same gentleman, as I remember, and I note that he believes that he represents the overwhelming mass of the labor leaders of the country. He did not inclose any credentials to that effect in the letter to me, except his own belief about it.

I rarely get a petition or suggestion of any kind about any subject from anybody but that he is quite sure that he represents the overwhelming mass of the American people, in his opinion, and if he does not he ought to, or the great mass ought to think as he does; so I take that for what it is worth.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I assume that the Senator from Connecticut will take this for what he thinks it is worth. I know that those who have opposed this legislation heretofore have purported to speak for labor, but they did not present very many credentials, either; and when what credentials were presented were analyzed, it was found that they did not represent very many of the people of the country. I present that letter for just what it is worth, and the committee will no doubt give it due weight.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I was one of those who opposed this legislation before, and I oppose it now. I have never pretended to represent labor, or to represent anybody or anything except my own opinion upon this question.

AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in the morning press of yesterday it was announced that War Department officials yesterday stated that a thousand Liberty aircraft motors were shipped from two American factories last Friday, and that within a few weeks this figure will represent the daily average of American plants. I have the best of authority for stating that this announcement is entirely incorrect and therefore grossly misleading.

INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I have a letter from David Lubin concerning the activities of the International Institute of Agriculture. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INSTITUT INTERNATIONAL D'AGRICULTURE,
Rome, le April 24, 1918.

Hon. HIRAM W. JOHNSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have received a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 9, showing a debate in the Senate relative to the International Institute of Agriculture.

I have just gone over it, and I see that a twofold attack was made, first, personal, against myself; second, against the institute.

First of all, I thank you very much for your friendly intervention in my behalf; you have placed me under many obligations. As for the stand in behalf of the institute taken by yourself and by your worthy colleagues, that is now on record; and whether this stand was worth while can safely be left to the decision of all those whose good opinion is worth having.

Let me answer the personal attack first: The premise upon which this attack was made was that some 25 years ago I advocated a duty on agricultural exports. This is not the case. I never advocated anything of the kind, as my public utterances on the subject, in print in the leading journals of the United States, clearly show. It was a bounty, not a duty, on exports that I advocated. (Please see addenda A.) So much for the personal attack.

And now for the institute: The debate on the floor shows that the objections offered were altogether due to a lack of information. Had my annual reports to the State Department been printed and distributed to Members of Congress they would have supplied the information required.

The objectors would have us infer that the institute's labors have been brought to a standstill by the war. This is not the case. The war has not stopped or curtailed the work. The meetings of the permanent committee, on which each country is represented by one delegate, are held regularly. Each of the bureaus, with its staff of employees (about 100 in all) is performing its functions as before the war; in fact, the work of the institute is going on with increased activity. This work is similar in character to that done by the United States Department of Agriculture and by the Department of Commerce, but instead of being on national lines it is on international lines; it is done for the world.

None of the belligerent nations have abrogated the treaty; all the 55 adhering Governments are full members, as before the war. Communications with the central Empires, by Government permission, go on regularly through Switzerland, and the temporary withholding of their crop-reporting data is of no moment so long as they are cut off from international trade.

And now let me briefly explain the work the institute is doing and its economic importance.

But before doing so I would ask you to bring to mind events of some 10 years ago. Then, as to-day, the people prayed, "Give us this day our daily bread," and the bread was given in abundance; but, alas, it was measured out, artificially reduced by sundry manipulations.

Do you remember the days of the Pattens, the Sullys, the Prices, and the Leiters? Do you remember how up to 10 years ago wheat, corn, cotton, and other staples of agriculture were cornered, were battledored and shuttlecocked on the home market and on the foreign markets, were footballed hither and thither by bull and by bear?

But during the past 10 years, since the institute began its labors, have you heard of any such corners? Have you heard of them in the home market? Have you heard of them in the foreign markets?

Why have they ceased?

They have ceased because the conditions which made such cornering possible have ceased.

What, then, were those conditions? Let us see.

The staples of agriculture, having a world market, are sold at a world price, just as stocks or bonds are sold in exchanges, bourses, or pits. This world price is determined by a knowledge of the available world supply. If the world's supply is above the normal the world's price will be low; if the supply is below the normal the price will be high. The world supply is made known by statistical information on the world area sown, on world conditions of growth, and on world harvest yields. Now, then, before the foundation of the institute, who gave out the figures for this world supply?

They were given out by sundry unofficial sources, some of which favored the bull interests, some the bear interests. The result was heterogeneous, conflicting summaries of the world supply, leading to conditions which made it possible to manipulate the world's prices and to corner the staples.

The International Institute of Agriculture has done away with this state of affairs. It has been delegated under treaty to gather in the crop-reporting data of the world. These it assembles, summarizes, and makes public.

Thus, in place of the former "sundry," the former "unofficial," the former "varying" summaries, which led to cornering the market, we now have, through the labors of this institute, the single, official, standard summary of the world's supply.

If the objectors had looked through the leading papers of the United States, indeed the leading papers of the world, they would have seen that the former private crop-reporting information, the information inspired by "bull" or "bear" interests, has disappeared, and in its place appear each month the official standard crop reports of the institute. Please see inclosed sample of clippings just received.

The institute's crop reports thus afford the official, authoritative basis for world price formation for the staples. To do away with them would be to return to the "sundry," the "unofficial," and the "varying" summaries; it would be to return to the cornering of the supplies.

But can not the Department of Agriculture supply this world summary? It can only do so after receiving it from the institute.

But could not the department gather the information direct from the nations of the world, assemble it, and give it out to the press just as is done by the institute?

No; it could not. It might obtain the information as a favor from a few of the nations, but there would have to be a treaty agreement before each of them would hold itself bound to supply such information regularly at the fixed dates required. Without such treaty the department might receive some heterogeneous data, largely incomparable, which it would have to try to reduce to its own standards before it could obtain its summaries. And even if the department could overcome all these difficulties—and I doubt very much if it could—its summaries would only then be official in the United States; they would not be "official" in other countries; hence they would not be "official" for the commerce of the world; they would not be the standard for determining the world's price of the staples. Thus they could not serve the purpose intended in the United States nor anywhere else.

Would the commerce of the United States accept a world summary got up by the Board of Agriculture of England as the official world summary? No; for it would be inferred that England as a buyer would be biased in favor of buyers. Would the commerce of England accept a world summary got up by our Department of Agriculture as the official world summary? No; for it would be inferred that the United States as a seller would be biased in favor of sellers. And the other countries would accept neither the one nor the other as the official summary.

The official summary acceptable to the commerce of all the nations of the world may only be had under treaty binding each nation to send in its crop reports in a stated manner, at a stated time, to a stated place, and under and in accordance with the international agreement laid down in that treaty.

The International Institute of Agriculture is under such a treaty, and has been placed under such international agreement, and works under it. As a result its crop reports are accepted as the authoritative statement for all the world.

But of what value is all this work to commerce and industry? We have already seen that it has done away with "cornering"; that it has eliminated the perturbing influences of the biased reports of bull and bear; that it has eliminated unnecessary price fluctuations; that it is steadying the world's markets; that it is conserving the equities to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars; and that it is doing all this all along the line from the producer down to the consumer, and that it is doing it in time of war as it did in time of peace.

It was to be expected that the former giants in the "cornering" business would oppose this work, would oppose this institute. So they do. They have done so from the start. They have tried hard to show that the upkeep of the institute was a waste of money; but they have not succeeded up to now in convincing the 55 nations members of this institute that money is thus wasted. Even countries so stricken by this war as Roumania and Belgium have paid their dues right along and have their delegates on the ground.

The foregoing shows but one branch of the institute's work, the work of its bureau of statistics. The work of its other bureaus may be seen from the copies of their several publications (monthly, half yearly, and yearly) which accompany this letter. It is also briefly set forth in Addenda B, and more fully in the illustrated official handbook of the institute, a copy of which is herewith inclosed.

So much for the work of the institute.

And now let me take up a criticism made by Senator SMOOT. He says: "Mr. Lubin spends a good deal of time in writing articles upon policies that he thinks ought to be adopted by the Government of the United States." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Feb. 4, 1918.)

As I recently wrote to Senator FLETCHER, Mr. SMOOT is right; in common with delegates of other prominent countries I do spend a good deal of time on such work. So should any delegate to this institute who attends to his duties properly. The functions of a delegate here are twofold: First, to attend to the duties and routine of the labors of the institute from the international standpoint and to keep the State Department informed thereon; second, to make observations from the point of vantage which the institute affords as a world observator of agricultural economics, and to crystallize these observations into definite statements and proposals for public consideration. This I have done. Some of these statements were in the form of hearings before congressional committees and the Department of State and have been put into the form of public documents. By far the larger number I have had printed here in Rome and mailed to the United States, largely to grange members and to other farmers.

"But," says Senator SMOOT, "it is costing the Government of the United States I do not know how much each year."

I think Senator SMOOT is mistaken. As I wrote to Senator FLETCHER, this special work does not cost the Government one cent. The time may come when the economic value of such labor will be more generally recognized and when Congress will make an appropriation to cover the cost. At this time there is no appropriation for this purpose; but realizing the economic value of the work to the United States I have been and am paying out of my own means to cover the cost of extra copies of the public documents, and for printing and mailing those articles which are got out from Rome. This cost aggregates to an amount several times in excess of the sum allowed me by Congress for salary. I do this because I feel the needs for the work, because I believe it to be of benefit to the American people.

And what were these statements and proposals about? Some related to the world crop-reporting service; some to the marketing of farm products; some to rural credits; some to irrigation as means of increasing the production of livestock; and some to the cost of ocean carriage on the staples of agriculture in its relation to the home price of the products and in its economic and political influences on the Nation.

A number of these proposals were introduced in Congress, some of them are still pending, while others have already been passed. Senator SMOOT is no doubt aware of this, for he may have voted on such an important measure as rural credits, and he may have voted on the joint resolution calling for an international conference (to be held in Rome at the close of the war) on the proposal for an international commission on ocean-freight rates.

Had Senator SMOOT and Senator WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, followed the case closely they would no doubt also have perceived the beneficial indirect influences of these proposals in shaping initiatives of State and local character in the field of marketing farm products and in the field of rural credits. In rural credits, for instance, let them compare the oppressive farm-mortgage situation as set forth by the Comptroller of the Currency, John Skelton Williams, with the improved farm-mortgage situation now prevailing throughout the country. And what led to this improved situation? Can it not be traced direct to one of the very proposals to which Senator SMOOT and Senator WILLIAMS so strongly object, the proposal so ably seconded and pioneered by Senator FLETCHER? I feel confident that with a fuller knowledge of the facts in the case Senator SMOOT and Senator WILLIAMS will begin to realize the economic value of these very proposals which they now so denounce.

Summarizing my comments, it seems strange that the objectors, who are statesmen of high order, should not have obtained correct ideas of the work of this institute, work the importance of which has been officially recognized, as shown by the large number of encomiums from governments now in the possession of the institute and by the requests from the United States Government for extra copies of the publications beyond those to which it is entitled by the appropriation.

Even if the objectors had gone no further than the press of the United States, they could have seen that the former contradictory, unofficial, manipulating statements on the world's supply have been replaced by the institute's official world crop reports, which now form the world standard, the determining factor in arriving at the world's price of the staples of agriculture. They could have seen that the institute's monthly crop reports afford the official data on which the governments of the allied countries base their food-control policy. They could have seen that the timely warnings given by the Institute in these monthly crop reports and in its half-yearly world balance sheet of supply and demand have enabled the allied governments, through their food controllers, to ward off impending famine which would otherwise have affected millions in the trenches and in the homes.

And as for the articles and statements to which they have offered objections, they could have seen that many of them were the result of hearings given by the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Labor, the Department of Commerce, the Department of State, and of hearings before congressional committees; and they could have seen that some of the policies advocated therein have already formed the basis of legislation adopted by the United States.

If the statements herein made are warranted by the facts in the case, I feel that I am justified in respectfully and earnestly requesting that this communication be printed for the information of the Members of Congress. With high esteem, I am,

Yours, very sincerely,

DAVID LUBIN,
Delegate of the United States, International Institute of Agriculture, Rome, Italy.

ADDENDA A.

In 1893 I wrote an article, which appeared in the Sacramento Bee, advocating protection for the staples of agriculture by a bounty on exports as long as manufactures were protected by a tariff on imports.

This proposal was widely commented upon by the press of the country. Some were in favor and some were against it.

The secretary of the American Protective Tariff League was asked to reply to the following questions:

(1) Does a tariff on imports protect the staples of agriculture as long as they are exports?

(2) If not, do not the producers of the staples pay for protection and sell at free-trade prices?

(3) Is this equitable? And if not, would it not be equitable to protect the staples by a bounty on exports as long as manufactures are protected by a tariff on imports?

After a long delay, word came from the secretary that the league had no reply to give.

In the meantime the State granges of California, Missouri, and of Pennsylvania indorsed the proposal and challenged the league to reply, but no reply came to hand.

It was found that an export bounty on the staples of agriculture had been in operation in England under William and Mary, when the bounty was paid on the proviso that the exports were carried in British bottoms, and that this gave the start for the upbuilding of the English Merchant Marine.

A convention of the Atlantic Coast Shipbuilders and Shipowners' Association was called by Mr. Charles H. Cramp in Philadelphia, at which Mr. Cramp presided, when the proposal was unanimously adopted. I was asked whether I would support the proposal of the export bounty on the staples, on the proviso that the same be carried in American ships. I replied in the negative pointing out that if this were done it would give the protection to the shipping interests instead of to the agricultural interests.

Finally a compromise was arrived at whereby the bounty would be divided between both interests.

It may be that after the war this proposal may again come to the front, not only for giving the agricultural interests the equities which they should have in the protective system but also as a means of building up the American merchant marine, which we now see it is so necessary for us to have.

DAVID LUBIN,
Delegate of the United States, International Institute of Agriculture.

ADDENDA B.

BRIEF SYNOPSIS OF THE WORK OF THE INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF AGRICULTURE.

[Fuller details will be found on the pages of the official illustrated handbook of the institute, as noted herein.]

The permanent committee: The executive authority of the institute is intrusted to the permanent committee, which is subdivided into four permanent commissions. Each State is represented on the committee by one delegate who resides in Rome. The permanent committee meets at least once a month, excepting during the vacation from July to September. (See pp. 10–11.)

Staff and bureaus: The staff of the institute, exclusive of messengers and printers, consists of about 100 employees, mainly translators, rédacteurs, and statisticians. These are distributed between the four bureaus: (a) General secretary's department and library; (b) general statistics; (c) agricultural intelligence and plant diseases; (d) agricultural economies. (See p. 18.)

Crop-reporting service: At stated times "questionnaire" forms are sent out to the Governments. The replies are sent in to the institute from near-by countries by mail and from distant countries by telegram or cable. Only official information sent in by the Governments direct in reply to the "questionnaire" may be used in getting up the institute's monthly crop reports.

Once a month the statisticians of the crop-reporting bureau of the institute assemble, coordinate, and set forth all this in given columns and tables, summarized into totals in the form of a "single numerical statement"; that is, 100 is taken as the five-year average; if the report reads, say, 98, it means 2 points below the average; if it reads, say, 102, it means 2 points above the average.

On the Saturday nearest the 20th of each month the institute publishes The International Crop Report and Agricultural Statistics. The substance of this report is given out to the Governments direct by cable and by telegraph and to near-by countries by mail. The Government authorities in each country then give these reports out to the press, and also make use of them in their own reports. (See pp. 21–22.)

Publications: (a) The monthly International Crop Report and Agricultural Statistics; (b) the monthly International Review of the Science and Practice of Agriculture; (c) the half-yearly International Movement of Fertilizers and Chemical Products Useful to Agriculture; (d) the monthly Documentary Leaflets on available supplies and prices of miscellaneous agricultural products in tropical countries; (e) the monthly International Review of Agricutural Economics; (f) the half-yearly Statistical Notes on Cereals, the world's agricultural balance sheet of supply and demand; (g) The International Yearbook of Agricultural Legislation; (h) the International Yearbook of Agricultural Statistics, the inventory of the world's agricultural resources, areas, production, exports, imports, prices, freight rates, etc.

Besides these, monographs on special subjects of importance to agriculture are issued from time to time. (See list on inside front cover.)

All these publications are in French, the official language of the institute, but, as stated in a report by the Secretary of State, the United States and Great Britain have each undertaken to contribute for the translation and printing of the same in English. The United States makes an annual appropriation of $5,000 for this purpose. As a result we receive several hundred copies of each publication in English instead of the few copies in French to which we should otherwise be entitled. These publications are sent regularly by the institute to Dr. A. C. True, chairman of the committee on relations with the International Institute of Agriculture, United States Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., who distributes them as directed by the Government authorities. (See p. 15.)

The proces-verbaux (minutes of the meetings), including reports on the budget, auditing, and financial status of the institute, are regularly printed, copies of which are transmitted by the delegate to the Department of State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4557.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (S. 4557) to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have sought several times to present this subject to the Senate, but I have been asked so many questions that in looking over the RECORD I find that my remarks have been so broken that I scarcely think they do it justice. If the Senate will bear with me just for a few minutes without interruption, I should be glad to make a brief review of this measure.

The amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] proposes to do away with the Federal Board for Vocational Education in the conduct of this work and to substitute the Surgeon General's office; and the question presented to the Senate is. Will you intrust the vocational rehabilitation of the injured soldiers to the Surgeon General's office or to the Federal Board for Vocational Education? We all wish to determine that question solely in the interest of the soldier.

Let us analyze the work of rehabilitation. The physical rehabilitation, in a sense, will be under the surgeons while the patient is in the hospital. That will last, probably, an average of two months. During that period there is some work that can be done toward brightening the mind and inspiring the hope and enlisting the aspiration of the patient; but, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] says, but little practical vocational work can be accomplished in the hospital. The patient, as a rule, most of the time is not in a condition to receive any substantial training. The real work will be after the patient leaves the hospital. Then the work will be to distribute the injured men to various institutions of great diversity. Let me illustrate by the experience in Canada. The soldiers are being taught by the Canadian commission in 196 different lines for their rehabilitation, to prepare them for vocational activity, and I ask the Consent of the Senate to print in the RECORD this list at the close of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The matter referred to is as follows:

ALPHABETICAL LIST OF OCCUPATIONS BEING TRAINED FOR IN CANADA.

1. Armature winding.
2. Agriculture.
3. Agricultural mechanics.
4. Accounting—municipal.
5. Arts—university.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. You can not establish half a dozen machine shops around a hospital to do this work. In the first place, the Surgeon General's office has not a dollar with which to do anything of the sort. The alleged teachers that he has are on the sanitary roll.

They are on the sanitary roll and could not be paid for out of anything else. They are commissioned as officers on the sanitary roll, the three men here, Messrs. Murray, Henderson, and Monahan. They are on the sanitary roll, I am advised, as the only place to which they could be appointed. If my information is correct, it needs no argument to show their appointments are without authority if they are really teachers.

But, Mr. President, let us go further and see what this work is of rehabilitation. At various institutions already in existence soldiers should be placed. Frequently a special instructor who has studied the rehabilitation of the injured will either be at the institution or visit it to stimulate the specal work needed for the particular soldier. This will go on for an average of at least 12 months.

I omitted, however, to say that many will be placed in shops, in lines of immediate work for which they are not yet fitted but as apprentices, when it is expected they can learn how to do what there is done.

This is a substantial part of the work. It is a distribution of the men to the school, to the industry, to the shop, and to the commercial house, where they can be trained as an aid to them in the effort to fit themselves for active work.

Then comes a still further great problem. It is the distribution of the men finally to places where they will find employment. All this is involved in the vocational rehabilitation of the injured soldier.

What training has the surgeon for such work? What organization has he for it? You might as well put a technical-school teacher in a hospital to perform surgical operations as to put a surgeon in charge of this work. If it is done in the Surgeon General's office, you must make a great teachers' organization there of specialists to take charge of it. You must try there to duplicate the Federal Board of Vocational Education as a new organization in the Surgeon General's office.

What is the Federal Board for Vocational Education? It consists of the Secretary of Agriculture, reaching out in agricultural matters through his representatives all over the country; on the board proper from civil life there is Mr. Greathouse, a superintendent of education at one time in Indiana, practically familiar with the work of the farmer touching every agricultural institution in the United States. Then we have the Secretary of Commerce and Mr. Monroe from civil life. Mr. Monroe was a successful manufacturer, a student of commerce, a graduate of the Boston "Tech.," who for a number of years has devoted his time without pay to stimulating better preparation by the average man for the labors of life. The Secretary of Labor is on the board, and Mr. Holder, representing labor. The Commissioner of Education is also upon it.

Thus we coordinate all the force we have to carry the soldier on, first through his course of training and then to his placement in a position that he can fill.

We have the entire organization of the Department of Labor, through the Secretary of Labor, upon this board to aid in placing the rehabilitated man where he is to work.

What has the Surgeon General to offer compared with this service? What preparation has he compared to it? I have shown you that the vocational rehabilitation, the vocational training, can be done but slightly in the Surgeon General's office. It is nearly all to be done after the patient is discharged. I entirely resen the suggestion that the healed man physically shall be kept under the rule of the War Department after he is healed; that he shall be forced to stay and abide by the direction of the War Department.

Where do the fundamental principles of the bill come from? They have been developed by study continued for more than four or five months past. First a large committee of philanthropic citizens and representatives of the Surgeon General's Department and representatives of the various branches of the Government, 50 I understand in number, worked upon the subject, and finally selected a committee headed by the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, by a representative of the War-Risk Bureau, by a representative of the Interior Department, by a representative of the Surgeon General's office, by a representative of the Federal Board of Vocational Education, and Dr. Gifford to consider the question and make a report.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would rather not yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then I will not ask to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I requested, when beginning, to be allowed to conclude without interruption.

Now, what did they consider? The Surgeon General's Department as the place for the work? Yes; and at once concluded that there was no training there or organization there to handle it. The War-Risk Bureau was considered. The conclusion was that this bureau pays off the men, but has no organization to handle this great educational work. Then was suggested the Interior Department and the Commissioner of Education. They had not the organization for vocational work. No organization is in touch as the Federal Vocational Board is with all the agencies in the land to serve these men.

Then they considered the question of creating a new board from civil life, and they worked upon that for a while, but they concluded that already a better board, a better organization already existed than any new one they could possibly create, and they finally unanimously agreed upon the Federal Board for Vocational Education as the proper organization to undertake this national effort for the rehabilitation of those who otherwise would lapse into idleness and permanent inefficiency.

But what did they do with their report? It was submitted to the Cabinet organization of the Council of National Defense—the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor.

I omitted to say that I understand the surgical organization of the Navy Department was ready to take charge. Both those surgical organizations were ready to assume the responsibility for the vocational education and rehabilitation of these men if called upon, but neither was really prepared for vocational training or for the distribution of the injured in places of employment.

After careful consideration the Council of National Defense unanimously agreed that the best branch of the Government to undertake this work was the Federal Board for Vocational Education. A bill was approved and sent to me as chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor of the Senate and to the chairman of the Committee on Education of the House. I called in the members of the committee and studied it before I introduced it. I reached the conclusion that it had the framework of wisdom and I did introduce it. Then the committee came together and we studied it. We passed a resolution authorizing me to invite the members of the House Committee on Education to sit with us in joint session. They accepted, and the two committees sat in joint session for days to hear testimony on thus subject.

We learned that the plan embraced in this bill was substantially the successful plan in force in England, in force in France, in force in Italy, and carried out in Canada. We had the benefit of the advice of the Red Cross, who have an organization or a school of this kind working in New York. We had the benefit of the experience of Canada afterwards elaborately presented to us by the director of the Canadian works, sent here by request of the Secretary of State and through the British ambassador.

The unanimous opinion presented to us was that this was the wise way, that military control was unwise, that the real development of the soldier came after he was free from uniform direction and exercised his complete independence as a civilian going into civil life; that where the military had been used failure had followed the effort; that a part of the work was to inspire him with confidence in himself, with reliance on himself, with independence, and that military direction was inefficient and unavailing.

We had Dr. Little, a very able man, who is the head of the Federal Employees Compensation Commission. He was also on the board that helped study the question. He is a man who has studied the subject of the injured coming from industries and is deeply interested in it. We had Gen. Gorgas, and he approved it. We had Dr. Billings, and he practically approved it. We invited these other men in the Army, these sanitary employees who were sitting there, to speak up if they had anything to say, and they were silent.

Mr. President, I would regard this bill as an entire failure if the Surgeon General's office were to take charge of vocational education. I have given you the history of the measure. I have given you the conclusion of the representatives of the Cabinet. I have given you the conclusion of commissions who have worked upon it. I have given you the conclusion of your two committees of the House and the Senate, who, after full hearings and the most earnest study they could put upon the question, unanimously approved this plan.

Now, if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] wishes to ask me a question, I will be glad to answer him. I wished to finish this much without interruption.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was very glad not to interrupt the Senator. I want to ask him this question. He spoke about whether the soldier after his discharge or after he had become rehabilitated should be kept under the control of the Surgeon General's office, and asked if it would not be better to send him back home and put him under the control of this Vocational Board. I wondered if he could not be sent back home and still be kept under the control of the Surgeon General's office, and let the Surgeon General's office have power to call upon the Federal board to furnish instruction if they thought it was necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. After he goes home?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think those connected with the Surgeon General's office are capable of determining what line of work the man can do. They can say how much physical endurance he can stand, they can say what his physical condition is, but the Surgeon General's office has not that knowledge of educational institutions in which help could be given to the injured man that the Vocational Education Board has.

I, however, said to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], who has shown me an amendment which he desires to offer, that I shall not object to it. It is that after he is discharged the Vocational Board shall have the benefit of the advice of the Surgeon General's office as to the physical condition of the man, just reversing the situation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But the Senator wants the Vocational Board to have the supreme authority?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And that the Surgeon General's office shall be simply advisory?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; after he is discharged.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let me present this idea to the Senator and see what he thinks of it. The soldier has been rehabilitated physically in the hospital under the jurisdiction of the Surgeon General's office. Whatever artificial limbs or appliances may be necessary for him to perform some trade or take care of himself in the future have been applied to him by the experts in the Surgeon General's office and in the hospital. It seemed to me that it would be better for the soldier to have the same experts who knew the manipulation and management of these artificial contrivances to take the place of hands to follow that man home and, at least theoretically, to have jurisdiction of him than to turn him over to the Vocational Board, whose business it is to teach agriculture and sewing and housekeeping and the different things that the Vocational Board teaches.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They direct instruction in every line of vocational education, including commerce—all except professions.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It seemed to me that the soldier himself would want that. I know if I was a soldier and had been supplied with means of using my hands or feet that had been shot away, if I had been by the surgeons and experts who will undoubtedly be under the control of the Surgeon General and the hospital care nursed back to life and health and efficiency, I would rather have their judgment control me when I went back home, supplemented by the Vocational Education Board, but with the Surgeon General's office in direction. That is my notion about it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am glad to have the Senator's question and am glad to give him my view of it as the result of my investigattion of the subject. In the first place, a much smaller per cent of the injured lose arms than I had supposed. There is but a small per cent, probably 10 per cent, who lose arms. Many of the injuries are of a different character. The work of the surgeon in perfecting the use of that hand simply gives the hand. The old hand and artificial arm, similar to the former arm, has been entirely discarded, and there is in its place a mechanical steel contrivance with springs. He has learned to manipulate it. He knows how to manipulate it, and he is discharged from the hospital. He is well. It is not, then, a question of simply knowing how to manipulate it. It is a question of taking that new hand and learning a trade. It is a question of going into some place for vocational instruction where he learns some occupation which he uses with this hand. It is believed that in the hospitals the surgeon in charge and the vocational trainer conferring may well help him and advise the patient as to what line he had best pursue.

I do not think the Surgeon General's office is at all in a position to carry the knowledge of the distribution and instruction of this man in the various lines he might follow after he leaves the hospital. Some will go to commercial schools, some will take one line of work, some another, the most varied lines should be open for selection, whatever his taste leads him to, his past experience somewhat fits him for, and the locality in which he lives offers. These problems involve vastly more information on educational and business lines than is possessed by the Surgeon General's office. We follow, as I said before, the practices and experience of other countries in concluding that the civilian vocational instructor is best to handle the injured after he leaves the hospital. But, as I said, I have agreed to an amendment which the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] will offer that the Vocational Board may call on those in the Surgeon General's office for advice and assistance, they do act in an advisory capacity to the Vocational Board after the discharge of the patient. I think in this way we may harmonize the combined effort for physical and vocational restoration——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It does not harmonize it in my mind, but it may in the minds of a majority of the Senate. I think the bill proceeds on an entirely wrong theory. I think it has the cart before the horse and is upside down.

In the case the Senator supposes, where the man has had an artificial hand adjusted to him and has been taught the use of it in the hospital, it seems to me when he comes home, if he knows how to use that hand and the springs work, to do anything with it he has a mind to, he does not need either the Surgeon General or a vocational artist to come around and tell him how to use his fingers. He has got to do that himself. I think there will be, however, plenty of these vocational artists on the pay roll. They are swarming through every town, trying to instruct these gentlemen how to pick up a nut or a bolt with their own hands, and they will stay there as long as they can, until they are separated from the job.

I think, however, the whole scheme of this is vast and impracticable. I do not think it will suit the soldiers; I do not think it will suit the public; I do not think it will work in this country. I think this whole subject ought to have been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs anyway; I do not think that the Committee on Education and Labor is the proper committee to consider the question of how to take care of our wounded soldiers and how to bring them back to useful occupations; but it has gone to the Committee on Education and Labor—the question of how to manage our wounded soldiers in the hospitals and how to make them useful citizens afterwards and to restore them to health. We have this, as I consider it, half-baked measure before us. We shall probably have to vote on it, "yes" or "no." I have not made up my mind how I shall vote. If this is the only thing that is going to be presented to us, I suppose I shall have to vote for it, because I want to try to do something to rehabilitate our wounded soldiers; but if I do vote for it, it will be with the feeling that it is not at all the best thing that could have been devised.

I think that is evidenced by the letter which the Surgeon General himself wrote here on yesterday, if it stands. Of course, he may have written another one this morning for aught I know; but if so, it has not been put into the RECORD as yet. The one he wrote yesterday I understand would not have gone into the RECORD if he could have seen the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] about a half hour before he did, but the Surgeon General evidently is of the opinion that this is wrong legislation. However, when the Senator from Georgia and the other high authorities on this question corral him in their offices and hold the weight of their great authority over his head he recants; and while he was opposed to the bill five minutes before that, he comes out and withdraws all opposition, but says he feels just as he did before about it. Of course that does not really convince me as a matter of unrebuttable testimony. As I have said, I shall feel, if I vote for this bill, that I am voting for a very dubious experiment. As I have also said, I think the whole matter should have gone to the Committee on Military Affairs.

I never have been enthusiastic about this National Board of Vocational Education, Mr. President. After a man has had a common-school education in this country and can read the newspapers and magazines, if he can not learn how to dig the soil or run a lathe in a mill without some vocational educational artist visiting his home every day or two to see how he is getting along and giving him Christian and friendly advice, why, then, we have got the kind of paternal government that the sooner we get rid of the better the country will be off. It is not the kind of government the fathers founded; it is a molly-coddle kind of institution that will denature the whole American public if we keep on in that sort of foolishness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE].

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I offered this amendment on yesterday, and I desire to offer as a substitute for that amendment the amendment which I now send to the desk and ask to have read. I will say that the first two paragraphs of the amendment are the ones which should be read; it is not necessary for the Secretary to read the remaining paragraphs, inasmuch as they merely perfect the bill, so that it will conform to the bill as it will be amended by the first two paragraphs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. FRANCE. It will be necessary, in order to understand the whole amendment, to read it in connection with the bill. I think that the first two paragraphs of the amendment, if they are read, will give the Senate a clear idea of the purpose of the amendment, which is the same purpose I had in mind when I offered the amendment which I presented on yesterday. I ask permission to now offer this as a substitute for that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 3, after the word "the" and before the word "vocational," it is proposed to insert the words "physical reconstruction and," so that it will read:

This act shall be known as the physical reconstruction and vocational rehabilitation act.

And on page 1, line 5, strike out the words "Federal Board for Vocational Education," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "board which shall be, and is hereby, created, to consist of the Secretary of War, the Surgeon General of the United States Army, the Surgeon General of the United States Navy; said board to be known as the National Board of Physical Reconstruction and Vocational Rehabilitation."

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, in connection with this amendment, I desire to say a very few words. There seems to be a considerable amount of confusion as to what the purpose of this legislation is. I find myself in entire agreement with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] when he is pleading for a system of vocational education for the country. I am personally very much in favor of Federal aid to the States in establishing proper systems of vocational education.

It seems to me that, as we consider this legislation we face two great problems which have been presented by this war. As we call our men for war, as we call them into the Army, we find that among the men of draft age we have some 700,000, I believe, who can neither read nor write their names, illiterates in that sense. We also find, what many have long contended, that not only have we many illiterates, but that in addition to the 700,000 men who can neither read nor write we have many additional hundreds of thousands who are not fitted in any way to take up intelligently the cause of defending their country in this crisis because they have not been properly trained, although they may not be illiterates in the ordinary sense of the word. Our prosecution of the war has already been greatly hampered by the fact that we have not a sufficient number of technically trained men. So this large question of vocational training is one which is pressing upon us now. We need to-day vocational schools to train technically our young men from 18 to 21 for the work of being soldiers which is to-day a highly technical occupation. The Vocational Board I think should consider the advisability of recommending to the Government a system of vocational training which shall train men vocationally for taking up the technical work which they are compelled to take up when they enter the Army. We need more machinists; we need more men who understand gasoline engines; we need more laboratory technicians; we need more chemists. There is one aspect of the great problem of vocational education.

Then, we have, on the other hand, the other aspect of the problem. When the war is over millions of our men will come back, after their education has been interrupted, after they have been out of their ordinary occupations for several years. I refer now to those who are not wounded. Many of them will be young men looking for occupations, many of them will be men who, after the experience of the war, will not be willing to go back to the unskilled labor which they performed previous to the war. I mean that many of them who were laborers before the war will have caught a larger vision of life, so that they will feel that they should have an opportunity for taking up some more technical line of endeavor.

I think we should have a great vocational system ready to take up and train such men and great employment systems ready to distribute them to the various lines of industry after they have been thus trained. All that is a great work which lies before us.

I am in favor of legislation making possible vocational training for men who are about to enter the Army and for the men who come back from the Army, and I am in favor of the extension of our Federal employment bureaus for the redistribution of these millions of men not only into proper vocational schools and into professional schools, but into the industries. That is a tremendous task which will confront us. So I find myself in no disagreement whatever with the Senator from Georgia.

I think the Vocational Board has a great work facing it; but I have conceived this particular legislation to be designed for an entirely different purpose. In that I may be mistaken, but I have conceived this to be legislation which is to-day necessary in order that the physicians and surgeons having these men now in the beds of our hospitals can begin that rehabilitation and reconstruction work, which is really therapeutic in its nature and which is directed to the whole man as he comes back from the front, to his mental state, to his nervous system, as well as to his physical incapacity. It is a very large subject to go into, but I saw in one of the hospitals a man who had returned from France with a functional paralysis of his right arm. That man was receiving medical treatment; he was receiving mental treatment because in such cases mental treatment is important; he was receiving electrical treatment; and he was receiving also that next advanced treatment, the rehabilitation treatment, which consisted in his taking up simple occupational work. His medical treatment, his mental treatment, his electrical treatment, would not have been complete without that occupational treatment, which was carried on during the interim between the other treatments, training his paralyzed fingers in the first effort toward carrying on a useful work.

I conceive—and if I am wrong in that conception, I should like to be corrected—this to be legislation necessary to meet the need which now confronts us as these men to-day lie in their beds in the hospitals. The problem is not a simple one. All of these men are not injured. Many of them have no injury at all which is visible. Some of them are totally incapacitated without a scar being visible, without the loss of a limb. Their trouble may be entirely mental. Others are incapacitated because of diseases which they may have contracted; and one of the most frequent causes of incapacity, I am sure we shall find in men returning from the trenches, will be tuberculosis. We shall have quite possibly very shortly ten, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty thousand, perhaps a hundred thousand, tubercular men returning from the front. They will be in all stages of tuberculosis, probably, but most of them will be in the incipient stages, because, if the men are properly watched over there, these cases should be detected in their incipiency; and if they are not detected in their incipiency it will be due to gross neglect. If a case of tuberculosis at the front is not detected in its very incipiency, the patient, if allowed to remain in the trenches or barracks, becomes a menace, of course, to all the other men.

Now, what is to become of these men who come back tubercular? I have seen a number of tubercular men who have come to the base hospital. If these tubercular men are to be distributed to the various State sanatoria, the Government will lose control of them altogether, and their educational work can not go on; but if all these tubercular patients are put in Government hospitals in tubercular wards they will have, of course, the attention of skilled surgeons and the very latest treatment, because I may say that the Surgeon General's office is in touch with the very latest treatment. They will have the benefit of the most modern and up-to-date medical treatment which can be given, and, in addition to that, they can be given, under the direction of the Surgeon General, rehabilitation courses; that is to say, some of them can be trained to take up lines of work which will be useful and suitable to them when, after proper treatment, they are cured and returned to private life.

If this is not a measure for the establishment of this first treatment, all that I have said should not have been said at all, and my amendment should not have been presented. I think I said yesterday that the country is under great obligations to the Senator from Georgia for his splendid advocacy of a better system of education for our country, particularly of a better system for vocational education; and the Senator will find no man more heartily with him than I shall be when he advocates such measures for the promotion of education in the future. I think the Senator from Georgia and I are in entire sympathy when it comes to the consideration of the problem of education, and particularly vocational education; but I have conceived this measure as being legislation which, as I say, will enable the Surgeon General to give this rehabilitation treatment, which is of a therapeutic nature, and to carry out the policy which he announced before this bill was drawn.

I shall read, in order that it may be in the RECORD, the policy of the Surgeon General, as announced before this bill was drawn. It is embodied in a statement which was made by him and printed in the Official Bulletin; and it was quoted by Mr. William H. Baldwin, treasurer of the National Tuberculosis Association, who testified before the committee, and whose testimony will be found beginning on page 102 of the hearings. The quotation to which I refer will be found upon page 103 of the hearings.

This is the language of the Surgeon General—and I thought that it was to follow out this policy, as announced by him, that this legislation was being considered:

That hereafter no member of the military service disabled in line of duty, even though not expected to return to duty—

And I say right here, in this connection, that many of these men, if they are not discharged, can be so treated, medically, mentally, and with vocational treatment, that they can be returned to active service; whereas if they are discharged before the treatment begins, they may not be so returned.

That hereafter no member of the military service disabled in line of duty, even though not expected to return to duty, will be discharged from service until he has attained complete recovery or as complete recovery as it is to be expected that he will attain when the nature of his disability is considered. The inauguration of this continued treatment will result, during the period of the war, in the saving to the service of a large number of efficient officers and soldiers who without it would never become able to perform duty.

Physical reconstruction may be defined as the completest form of medical and surgical treatment carried to the point where maximum functional restoration, mental and physical, has been secured. To secure this result the use of work, mental and manual, will be required during the convalescent period. This therapeutic measure, in addition to aiding greatly in shortening the convalescent period, retains or arouses mental activities, preventing "hospitalization," and enables the patient to be returned to service or civil life with the full realization that he can work in his handicapped state, and with habits of industry much encouraged if not firmly formed.

I thought that this bill was to carry out that policy announced by the Surgeon General. If this bill is not to carry out that policy but to establish a system of vocational training, both for those who are about to enter the Army and for those who leave the Army, whether they be disabled or not, then the contention which I have made has not been wisely made. If that is the case, let us consider this entirely as a vocational education measure and pass it. Then I wonder how a bill will be prepared to take care of this need, which is now so apparent in the hospitals. If this bill is legislation which contemplates the adoption of a general system of vocational education and rehabilitation, then, of course, it is not the bill which I took it to be, and it will be necessary for us to pass other legislation enabling the Surgeon General to carry on this physical rehabilitation which it is so important that he should be authorized to carry on at the present time. I thought, and I still think, he is authorized to carry on this work now as part of his medical and surgical treatment of these patients. The old idea that medicine is merely the giving of nauseous drugs has long since been abandoned, and you will find in many of our clinics for nervous diseases that no drugs whatever are given; the treatment is entirely manual, mental, and occupational. I do not care to enlarge upon that subject.

I will say now that this amendment merely does this: It creates a new board, to be composed of the Secretary of War, the Surgeon General of the United States Army, and the Surgeon General of the United States Navy. This amendment, of course, is offered because I conceive this legislation to be legislation to enable these medical men to carry out this remedial work, and that practically is the whole purpose of the amendment. The first paragraph merely changes the name of the act, so that it is called the "Physical reconstruction and vocational rehabilitation act." The second paragraph creates a new board.

It seems to me that this is the situation: If we pass this as a vocational education measure, then we must pass another act to give the Surgeon General the authority to give this treatment if he needs it; and in view of the opinion of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], one of the ablest lawyers in this body, if I understood him correctly, it seems to me that he may possibly need additional authority for giving this unusual form of treatment. If this bill is not designed to give him that authority, if it is merely a vocational education measure, then, of course, we must pass other legislation giving him the power to apply these remedial measures, and giving him the money also for providing the apparatus and the teachers for the application of these remedial measures.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRANCE. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator believe that the two can be properly separated as a practical proposition?

Mr. FRANCE. I feel that they can not be separated, because this occupational treatment is as truly a part of the medical and surgical treatment of the patient as any strictly medical or physical treatment could be. Until he is discharged, I think, the patient should be under the complete control of the Surgeon General. After patients are discharged, then, of course, further vocational training and the redistribution of these men through the various employment agencies after their vocational treatment is an entirely different proposition. If we conceive this to be legislation merely granting additional powers and money to the Surgeon General for the proper carrying out of treatment, I should myself favor a measure which would enable the vocational board to provide additional vocational education facilities, not only for the treatment of those who may need further vocational treatment after they are discharged because of disability, but further vocational education to many of those men who will come back having abandoned their original occupation and not having a training for the new occupation which they desire to take up, as a result perhaps of the renewed interest which may have been aroused during their training and experience in the Army.

I think that this whole debate is really the result of misunderstanding. I consider this to be a measure authorizing certain remedial treatment to be applied by the Surgeon General, and that later on we should have a measure providing for the general vocational-education problem which now confronts us as a result of our experience in this war.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not desire to reply to the Senator from Maryland further than to say that this is the same thing in a different shape—the question as to whether the military authorities shall take charge of this work or whether civilians shall take charge of it. Two of the members of the board which he suggests—the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy—have each approved the other course, and believe that the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of Labor, and this board are better suited for the work.

Mr. FRANCE. I will say to the Senator that I do not provide that the Secretary of the Navy shall be a member of this board.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thought the Senator did.

Mr. FRANCE. The board is to be composed of the Secretary of War, the Surgeon General of the Army, and the Surgeon General of the Navy. It is a strictly medical board under the general supervision of the Secretary of War.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Sutherland
Bankhead	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Swanson
Borah	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Thomas
Brandegee	Jones, Wash.	Page	Thompson
Culberson	Kendrick	Phelan	Townsend
Curtis	Kenyon	Poindexter	Trammell
Dillingham	King	Pomerene	Underwood
Fall	Lenroot	Ransdell	Vardaman
Fernald	Lewis	Reed	Wadsworth
Fletcher	Lodge	Shafroth	Walsh
France	McCumber	Sheppard	Warren
Gallinger	McKellar	Shields	Weeks
Gerry	McLean	Smith, Ariz.	Wilfley
Gulon	Martin	Smith, Ga.
Harding	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Henderson	New	Sterling

Mr. NEW. I wish to announce the temporary absence on official business of the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY].

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce the absence on official business of the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LENROOT. The other day I called attention to the item in the bill appropriating $545,000 for tuition, and called attention to the fact that the item was not confined to the tuition of disabled persons, and it is the only place in the bill where the word "disabled" is not used before the word "persons." The Senator from Georgia indicated his willingness to accept an amendment inserting the word "disabled" at that point, and I offer that amendment. On page 7, line 6, where it reads "for tuition for persons pursuing courses in existing institutions, public or private, $545,000," I move to insert the word "disabled" before the word "persons."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not object to that amendment. It means that already.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, when the bill was before the Senate a few days ago I called attention to what I thought was unfortunate phraseology both in the title of the bill and throughout the bill where it occurs numerous times, the title of the bill being "a bill to provide for vocational rehabilitation." I observed that I could understand what is physical rehabilitation. A man has a broken arm and is cured; he is physically rehabilitated; if he has pneumonia and gets well, he is again physically rehabilitated, but how he can be vocationally rehabilitated when there is nothing to be compared with, so far as his previous condition is concerned, I could not quite understand.

This morning a note was handed to me at my desk, apparently written by some one of my colleagues. I do not know whom; it is anonymous. It reads as follows:

Usually your grammatical criticisms are well taken, but as to vocational rehabilitation in some instances you are mistaken. I know a man whose vocation was selling clothing. He was seriously disabled in the machinery of the bankruptcy court, but he has been vocationally rehabilitated by the Government by giving him a fat office.

Mr. President, that is a criticism which does not very directly apply to the suggestions I made. I am going to ask to have read from the desk from the Century Dictionary two paragraphs that I have marked.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Rehabilitate: To restore to a former capacity or standing; reinstate; qualify again; restore, as a delinquent, to a former right, rank, or privilege lost or forfeited: a term drawn from the civil and canon law.

Rehabilitation: The act of rehabilitating or reinstating in a former rank, standing, or capacity; restoration to former rights; restoration to or reestablishment in the esteem of others.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not know that I shall move an amendment changing the word to "training," but I do want to call attention to the fact that throughout the bill both the terms "rehabilitation" and "training" are used. During the first three or four pages the word "rehabilitation," I think, is used in every instance; but when the person who drew the bill got over to page 6 we find "vocational training," "vocational rehabilitation," and then the title of the board is the "Federal Board for Vocational Education." Again, on page 7, the word "training" occurs, and in several other instances throughout the bill.

I suggest to the Senator from Georgia that I think the bill would be in better form if he would agree to have the word "rehabilitation" changed to "training," so that the title will read "to provide for vocational training and return to civil employment of disabled persons," and so forth.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me?

Mr. GALLINGER. Most certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I think the word "vocational" is used in that connection in the same sense that the words "physical rehabilitation" are used. We speak of physical rehabilitation. That is one kind. This vocational rehabilitation is of an intellectual kind. It is simply an adjective, and I think it is proper the way it is.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the very suggestion I have made, that we can physically rehabilitate a man; but how we could rehabilitate him by teaching him arithmetic that he did not formerly understand, I confess, is beyond my comprehension. However, I am only going to make that suggestion to the Senator from Georgia, and if he is satisfied to have the bill as it is I certainly have no objection; but it is certain that if the word "rehabilitation" is to be retained in the bill, even then the bill ought to be examined by the Senator from Georgia with a view to making it uniform, which it is not now.

Mr. President, before taking up one other point I am going to ask the Senator from Georgia who constitute this Federal Board for Vocational Education or Vocational Training?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Secretary of Agriculture; the Secretary of Commerce; the Secretary of Labor; the Commissioner of Education; Mr. Monroe, of Boston; Mr. Greathouse, of Indiana; and Mr. Holder, of Washington.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator further if he will kindly state for my information how much work that board has done along the lines committed to it by the act creating it; whether they have done very much work?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They have done a great deal of work. They have supervised and finally approved the plans for vocational work in the States. Not only that, but they have done a great deal of work for the War Department in getting up information with reference to the training of soldiers. They have prepared the outline of work for the War Department in a number of instances under which those being prepared for military service are being trained. They are now conducting studies in Canada, with funds furnished by the Red Cross, to aid in preparation for the vocational rehabilitation of injured soldiers and sailors.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is most excellent work. I was wondering whether the States to any considerable extent had entered into cooperation with the board in the work.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think practically every State has done so. I have not heard of a State that has not created its own board, accepted the grant, and engaged in vocational work under the provisions of our act for national aid to vocational instruction.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have just been glancing at the statute, with which I was familiar when it was passed. Very liberal appropriations are provided, and I can see that the board has a great trust imposed upon it and a great duty to perform if the statute is carried out as it was contemplated it should be. I am glad to hear from the Senator from Georgia that the board is busily engaged in the work that was committed to it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The three salaried men have been here all the time working constantly, and the member from Massachusetts even used his own money to pay rent before an appropriation was made. It is a work of love and patriotism and benevolence.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator who are the three salaried men, if he will kindly state?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. Monroe, Mr. Greathouse, and Mr. Holder. The salaries are only $5,000 each.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is a very modest salary as compared with what we have been voting of late.

Mr. President, I need not for my own protection say that I am in favor of the Government dealing with magnificent generosity with the men who are fighting our battles on the bloody fields of France to-day. I want the Government to do everything it possibly can do to alleviate their sufferings and make their life more tolerant. The passage of the war-risk insurance act was a magnificent tribute of our people to the fact that we want to do everything we can for our soldiers. Sometimes I can not help harking back to the Civil War, where our soldiers, for $13 a month and the poor promise of a pension of a small amount, fought the battles of the Union, accepting $13 a month during the period of the war, when gold was at $2.80, making their $13 worth about $5 a month, as I remember it. I am glad that in this great war we have done justice to our soldiers. Early in the discussion of war matters I insisted that they should be given at least $30 a month, which I thought was a very small compensation. They have been given that and their families have been provided for in a reasonably generous way.

Now, the duty rests upon us as a nation to care for the wounded and the sick, and no man can go further than I in agreeing to that proposition; but I am clearly of opinion that we are making a mistake in taking this out of the hands of the War Department and the Surgeon General's office. It is going to be a very difficult matter, in my judgment, to administer this law with a divided responsibility.

I was pleased to have the Senator from Georgia and the Senate agree to an amendment that I offered allowing the medical officers to have control of the soldiers until they had reached a period of convalescence and where the medical officers would certify they then could be passed over to this board in the matter of educational exercises or treatment. That was something that I thought was extremely important, because I could not for the life of me, having had some knowledge of medicine and having had a good deal of experience in hospitals, understand how an outside board or an individual could invade the hospital and claim any authority over the soldier when he was being treated either medically or surgically. That amendment has greatly improved the bill from my viewpoint, and I am going to venture the hope that if that particular provision goes to conference, as it may, the conferees on the part of the Senate will insist upon its retention.

Mr. President, I know this bill is going to pass—at least, I assume it is—and I can only express the hope that it may be found to be a workable law, which I questioned a few days ago, and which still remains a matter of doubt in my mind. I fear its administration between the Medical Department of the Army and this outside board will result in conflict and in differing views that will make it a very difficult matter to carry on successfully. But that is only my opinion. Others differ from me in that. The Senator from Georgia feels that there is no danger of friction whatever. The Senator from Georgia I have found always to be a man who takes rather optimistic views of things that he believes in, and I can only hope that the Senator from Georgia is nearer right in his views on this point than I am.

I have thought, Mr. President, in view of the fact that this has been taken out of the hands of the War Department and the medical officers of the War and Navy Departments that I should vote against the bill, but I have reconsidered that feeling in the last half hour, and I am going now to announce that while I do not think my vote would be a determining factor one way or the other, as this measure seems to be the best we can get under existing conditions, I shall vote for the bill when it is upon its final passage.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I desire to submit an amendment. I will say that I submitted this amendment to the Senator from Georgia, in charge of the bill, and he does not object to it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have also submitted it to those members of the committee on the floor, and we all feel that there is no objection to the amendment. As far as I am concerned, I accept it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read.

Mr. RANSDELL. I ask that it be read.

The SECRETARY. Amend section 6 by inserting after the word "training," in line 24, page 5, the last word in the line:

A plan shall also be established between the War and Navy Departments and the board whereby these departments shall act in an advisory capacity with the board in the care of the health of the soldier after his discharge.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not care to discuss the amendment unless some question is asked. The amendment does not need any explanation. I will say that I prepared it in conjunction with Col. Billings, of the Army, who thinks it quite important that the Medical Department should have some right to advise in regard to the physical condition of the soldiers even after they have been discharged. Something might arise that would render their advice necessary, and they are to act merely in an advisory capacity. They will not have the right to interfere, but they can advise with the vocational board.

You will note that before the soldiers are discharged the vocational board has a right to advise with the Medical Corps of the Army and the Navy. This gives the Medical Corps of the Army and the Navy a right to advise after the soldier has been discharged.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Suppose they can not make any arrangement? Suppose there can be no agreement reached between the Army and Navy and the board, then does the work fall?

Mr. RANSDELL. I will state to the Senator that we are following the exact wording which the committee prepared very carefully. You will note in line 20, page 5, of the bill, it says that "a plan shall be established between these agencies." The bill was very carefully prepared by the committee and those identical words were written in, and in preparing my amendment I followed the same wording. It reads:

A plan shall also be established between the War and Navy Departments—

And so forth.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator complete the sentence, please?

Mr. RANSDELL (reading)—

A plan shall also be established between the War and Navy Departments and the board whereby these departments will act in an advisory capacity with the board in the care of the health of the soldier after his discharge.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the effect of the amendment is simply this——

Mr. RANSDELL. It is suggested to me that I omitted the word "sailor." I hope there will be no objection to adding, after the word "soldier," the words "or sailor." I now yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My view is that while the soldier or sailor is under the control of the Army or Navy the Educational Board can advise with the control there and help about the industrial work. After he is discharged from the Army and his training is under the direction of the Federal board, they can then have the benefit of the advice of the Surgeon General's department. It really authorizes the Surgeon General's department after the discharge both in the Army and in the Navy to aid the Federal board by counsel and advice with reference to the physical condition of the patient. I think it helps to merge the work and is really important.

Mr. RANSDELL. I should like to add that this amendment was prepared by Col. Billings and myself and that it meets the hearty approval of Col. Billings, and he told me he was authorized to speak for the Surgeon General. They both approved it and thought it would be quite helpful.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I recognize the very good intention of this amendment. Of course, it is an effort, an eleventh-hour effort, to try to bring about coordination. It really is a recognition of the fact that we can not distinguish or draw a line between the medical and surgical treatment on one side and the vocational treatment on the other. It is a recognition of that fact. That is the very thing that I have been contending for all through this debate and have been wearying the Senate with the contention, I fear.

It is rather an unusual piece of legislation, let me say, Mr. President, to find a mandatory provision in a bill providing that a medical officer shall have supervisory or advisory functions over civilians, which this amendment does. The amendment states that the War Department or the Surgeon General's department shall cooperate with and advise as to the physical health of persons after they are discharged from the military service. It certainly is injecting the military service into a field which does not belong to it.

Now, it may work. I submit that it is a pretty crude suggestion, and it is evident that some persons at least are nervous about the administrative features of the bill.

I have said all along, Mr. President, that this whole business should be under one head from the day the man goes into the hospital until he has completed his vocational training, and I submit that the offering of this amendment and its acceptance by the chairman of the committee, in some small degree at least, admits the correctness of my contention, for here it is now acknowledged that the medical and surgical treatment in all probability must continue on into the vocational education.

I admire the spirit back of this amendment. I understand, I think, what Col. Billings wants to accomplish or wants, rather, to safeguard. This is an effort to safeguard these men against the abuses and shortcomings which will, in my judgment, inevitably arise under the bill, which upon its face tries to draw the line between the physical treatment and the vocational treatment. It is a desperate effort to bridge that chasm and connect the two together by a double system of advisory functions.

I would be better pleased with it if the word "shall" could be taken out and the word "may" put in.

Mr. RANSDELL. I much prefer to have it the way it is. I could not consent to that, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the word "shall" in the bill as it now stands should not be there.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana, as suggested to me by the remarks of the Senator from New York, What does the Senator understand this amendment to mean? In discussing it he said it gives the right of the Surgeon General and his force to follow up and control these men. In the language of the Senator from New York, it is an anomolous statute that gives to an Army officer the command of a man in civil life or the control of him. I do not understand this right of the Surgeon General over men in civil life, or the right to treat them whether or not they want to be treated by him. If it was amended so as to read something like this, "That this board, whenever they deem it necessary, may call upon the Surgeon General's office for the treatment of these men," then I think it would be a reasonable and a beneficial provision. Put it under the control of the board. Let them call them in when they need them, and let them stay out unless they do call them in, because when a man is once discharged from the Army no military officer ought to have a word to say in controlling his conduct either in health or in sickness. This is a meritorious bill and those charged with the execution of it should not be hampered with officious interference.

Mr. RANSDELL. In response to the Senator I will say that this does not give the military a right to control at all after the men are discharged.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator used the word "right"——

Mr. RANSDELL. I let the Senator have his say. Now let me have my say; one at a time, please.

The amendment reads that they shall act in an advisory capacity, and the previous provision of the bill says that the vocational board shall act in an advisory capacity prior to the discharge of the men.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. Pardon me. I will yield to the Senator in a moment, but I shall not yield until I have made my statement.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not blame the Senator for not yielding, in view of his position.

Mr. RANSDELL. It is distinctly stated in the bill that the Medical Corps of the Army and Navy shall have absolute control of the men until they are discharged; but the Senator from Georgia, in charge of the bill, has repeated time and time again that he does not intend the Vocational Board to interfere with the Medical Board except in an advisory way until after the men have been discharged. They will advise, but they will not interfere; they will not control. The whole control will be in the Army until the men have been discharged. After they have been discharged, under the terms of this bill, if it be enacted, the vocational board will be in control of the men. I think I understand that correctly—that the vocational board will control.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They are in control to the extent of furnishing the men the opportunity.

Mr. RANSDELL. I understand that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No one has the right to control them against their will.

Mr. RANSDELL. And the Medical Corps of the Army and Navy would be expected, and it will be their duty, to advise with the vocational board as to the health of the men. They will have no right to take control from the educational board at all, but they will have the right to advise as to the health of the men; that is all.

Now I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the Senator's last definition of his amendment is much more satisfactory than the first.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am glad if I please the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. First, the Senator said it was intended by this provision to give the Surgeon General's Office the right to advise, to follow up these patients, and he declined the suggestion of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] to strike out "shall" and insert "may," because he said Col. Billings would not be willing to have it done or he did not have authority for it.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator is mistaken. I said nothing of the kind. I do not follow blindly Col. Billings or anybody else. I said that we had used the word "shall" previously in the bill, and I was going to follow the same term in this amendment which we had followed before.

Mr. SHIELDS. If the Senator does not want to confer the absolute right, as he first indicated—using the word "right" repeatedly—on the Surgeon General to do these things, why not agree to the suggestion of the Senator from New York and use the word "may"—"may when called upon by the board"?

Mr. RANSDELL. The matter would be entirely satisfactory to me in the shape it is, but I am following the form which was worked out here very carefully by the Committee on Education and Labor. I repeat that, having adopted that form in regard to the advisory power of the Vocational Board, it seems to me well to follow the form as to the work after the men are discharged.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask the Senator if he will permit an interruption?

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes, sir; and I am always delighted to yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Would the Senator look with favor upon an amendment striking out the word "shall," in line 20, on page 5, and substituting the word "may," and then to make his amendment read "may" instead of "shall"?

Mr. RANSDELL. I believe that would really be better legislation, and if the committee agree to accept that I shall agree to accept the word "may" in the amendment; but if the word "shall" is used in one instance, it seems to me, to be consistent and logical, we must use it in both instances. I am not in control of the bill, but if the Senator in control of the bill is willing to adopt the word "may," in line 20, I shall make no objection to its adoption in my amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, my own view is that the word "may," as applied to the duties of public officials, means "shall." I do not object to the word "may" being used in each place, but it requires them, as a matter of duty, to carry out the suggestion as far as it is practicable to do so.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the committee will agree to the change.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am willing to accept the word "may" in this instance. I do not think it makes any difference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will say to the chairman of the committee that I am entirely willing to accept the word "may" in my amendment, with the understanding that it is accepted in the other instance, as stated by the chairman of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will make that change in the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana. The change in the bill, of course, the Senator from Louisiana has no power to make.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Chair will submit the question, I think, by unanimous consent, the change will be made.

Mr. RANSDELL. I ask unanimous consent for the change which the chairman suggests in line 20, so that it may be acted upon before I am requested to accept the amendment to my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that change will be made.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall call for the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. RANSDELL. Before that is done, I should like to submit another amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I merely wanted to ask if the amendment which had been proposed by the Senator from Louisiana was submitted to the Senate for a vote?

Mr. RANSDELL. I understood that it had been submitted and been adopted. Did the Chair submit it to the Senate?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think so. I do not think the amendment was submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the Senator from Washington is correct. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask the Chair not to put the question in that way. We want a vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL].

Mr. RANSDELL. I should like to know on what the Chair was putting the question. Was it the proposition to change the word "shall" to "may"?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana as modified.

Mr. RANSDELL. I ask for a division.

The question being put, on a division Mr. RANSDELL's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANSDELL. I submit another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, page 2, line 8, after the word "board," it is proposed to insert the words "after his discharge."

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to say in regard to that amendment—and I do not want to debate it at all—that I am offering it simply to clear up what seems to me a little confusion. If the chairman of the committee will state that this is meant to be after the man's discharge, following the use of the word "board," and if that is what the committee intends, I shall not urge my amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is what the language means. The entire responsibility of the Federal Vocational Board with authority to control is limited by the words "after discharge," in the second line of the section; and there is no necessity to repeat them further on because they go through the section.

Mr. RANSDELL. Then I understand the Senator would have no objection to the insertion of those words except that it would be tautology and entirely unnecessary?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not say that at all. I object to the amendment because I think it unnecessary. I think the section is complete; but if the Senator wants a vote upon his amendment, I will give him one. I do not think, however, he ought to press it further.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not want a vote on the amendment if that is what the committee intends the language to mean.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I speak for myself as to my view of the construction of the language.

Mr. RANSDELL. Now, may I ask the Senator one other question with regard to the words following the word "section," in line 12? I have another amendment which I was going to offer. I desire to insert the words "after their discharge," following the word "section," in line 12, on page 2. Does the Senator understand that the section as it stands means after their discharge? Would that be so understood?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia has already stated that the only authority given for control in this bill is after their discharge; but that principle follows though the entire bill, and it is expressly declared further on that the Navy and the Army shall control until after the soldier is discharged. That is my view of the bill from first to last.

Mr. RANSDELL. So that the Senator thinks——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have stated that that was my construction of the bill until I think I have tired the Senate with hearing it.

Mr. RANSDELL. May I merely ask the Senator from Georgia if he thinks it is entirely unnecessary to insert those words—that that is understood anyway?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do, and I told the Senator so in private when he asked me.

Mr. RANSDELL. I simply desire the Senator to say in public what he has stated to me privately.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have so stated.

Mr. RANSDELL. That satisfies me, and I will not ask for a vote on the amendment. I withdraw the amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I was called away for a few moments, and I wish to inquire whether the amendment submitted by the Senator from Louisiana was agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was agreed to with a slight modification by striking out the word "shall" and inserting the word "may."

Mr. GALLINGER. When a short time ago I made some observations on the bill and suggested that at one time I thought I would not support it in view of the fact that it was not left in the hands of the medical authorities of the War and Navy Departments, I had supposed that at that time that amendment had been agreed to; but I was mistaken as to that. I had seen it and thought it had been agreed to at the last session of the Senate. I simply wish to say that I feel that amendment very greatly improves the bill and removes many of the objections that some of us have felt so far as the bill itself is concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On the passage of the bill I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], which I transfer to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD] and vote "yea."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. I do not know how he would vote upon this measure if he were present, and therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], but I am informed that if he were present he would vote on this bill as I intend to vote. Therefore I feel at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], but I am advised that if present he would vote as I intend to vote. Therefore I feel at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMPSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], whom I do not see in the Chamber, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WOLCOTT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS (when the name of Mr. WEEKS was called). I am requested to announce that the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] is paired with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], and that, if present, the Senator from Massachusetts would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], occasioned by illness. He is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], who is absent on official business, is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX].

Mr. GERRY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. KIRBY. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] on public business.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], in whose absence I inadvertently voted. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. If present and at liberty to vote, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the affirmative). I transferred my pair to the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY]. He has since come into the Chamber and voted, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 61, nays 0, as follows:

YEAS—61.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the further pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask the Senator from Kansas if he will not withdraw that motion, as several Senators have indicated a desire to have an executive session?

Mr. CURTIS. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, May 27, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 25, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, Almighty God, for all the great and good men of all the world who have contributed to the sum of human happiness; for all that we have done here and elsewhere as a people for the uplift and betterment of mankind.

We look back with gratitude to Thee and we trust with pardonable pride to the deeds wrought by our fathers in the establishment of a government of the people, and which, through all the vicissitudes of the past, their sons have maintained and upheld in reaching out a helping hand to the oppressed and downtrodden of all the world.

We are facing a world-wide crisis which threatens the overthrow of all the achievements of the past and present which freemen have sought to establish and uphold.

Let Thy blessing follow us and our allies in the stupendous struggle and give us at last a victory which shall establish peace for all the world and liberty for all mankind; and glory and honor and praise shall be Thine forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a few observations on a matter which I think borders on a question of privilege.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman withhold a moment?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

ELECTION TO A COMMITTEE VACANCY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move the election of Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi to fill a vacancy on the Committee on the Census among its Democratic membership.

The SPEAKER. The nomination of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS] for a place on the Census Committee has been made. Are there any other nominations? If not, those in favor of the election of Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi will say "aye," those opposed "no."

The question was taken, and Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi was elected.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

The SPEAKER. Now what is it the gentleman from Massachusetts desired to call attention to?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, in the daily Record of May 22 there appears on page 7490, under permission granted to the gentleman from New York, Mr. CALDWELL, an "extension of remarks." These remarks were evidently intended to convey information to the country as to the establishment of a mutual admiration society of which the gentleman from New York and the Secretary of War are the charter members. I have made diligent inquiry among Members of the House on both sides and was present on May 22 quite constantly, and I have been unable to ascertain that these remarks were delivered on the floor of the House. And yet, strange though it may seem, expressed throughout those remarks, at the end of several eloquent periods, in brackets appears the word "Applause." I had thought that a certain other distinguished gentleman, a Member of this body, had a sort of copyright upon that infraction of the rules in inserting applause in his remarks when he delivered them. I believe that this extension of remarks appearing in the RECORD containing the word "Applause" in remarks which were not delivered on the floor of the House ought to be corrected, and I believe that the incident requires some explanation.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. In addition to that, I think that the extension of remarks under the leave granted is open to criticism in another direction. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman thinks this is an infringement on the copyright or monopoly of another gentleman he has mentioned?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; although I have not mentioned the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make a motion on the subject or not?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; I intend to. I think that the remarks should be corrected by expunging the words indicating the happening of something on the floor of the House which did not occur.

But I notice that the gentleman from New York is not present this morning, and perhaps it will be only fair and just to him that the matter be brought to his attention in this way, and I will defer making the motion until I ascertain that he is present. But I think it is only fair to the Members of the House, as affecting its dignity and the strict observation of its rules, that this matter should be brought to their attention.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 9715. An act extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Bayou Bartholomew, in Ashley County, Wilmot Township, State of Arkansas;

H. R. 4910. An act to authorize the establishment of a town site on the Fort Hall Indian Reservation, Idaho; and

H. R. 5489. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exchange for lands in private ownership lands formerly embraced in the grant to the Oregon & California Railroad Co.

RENT PROFITEERING IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 600).

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on Senate joint resolution 152, to prevent rent profiteering in the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 152) to prevent rent profiteering in the District of Columbia.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement was read.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 152) to prevent rent profiteering in the District of Columbia having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, and 28, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the language proposed by the House insert the following: "a treaty of peace shall have been definitely concluded between the United States and the Imperial German Government, unless in the meantime otherwise provided by Congress," and in line 3 of the engrossed bill, after the word "until," strike out "the"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 1, line 6, of the engrossed bill, after "agreement," strike out the strike out "or written" and insert "of"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 27: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 2, line 16, of the engrossed bill, after the word "agreement," strike out "or written" and insert "of"; and the House agree to the same.

BEN JOHNSON,
ROBERT CROSSER,
WM. J. CARY,
Managers on the part of the House.
WILLARD SAULSBURY,
ATLEE POMERENE,
LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 152) to prevent rent profiteering in the District of Columbia submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on:

The Senate recedes from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, and 28.

Amendment numbered 1: The Senate recedes with an amendment. The effect of this change in the amendment of the House is to make this legislation effective until a treaty of peace shall have been concluded between the United States of America and the Imperial German Government unless, in the meantime, otherwise provided by Congress, instead of until one year after such treaty of peace shall have been concluded as provided in the House amendment.

Amendments numbered 4 and 27: The Senate recedes with amendments. These amendments simply strike out after the word "agreement" the two words "or written" and insert the word "of."

BEN JOHNSON,
ROBERT CROSSER,
WM. J. CARY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, unless some gentleman desire that I yield, I will move the previous question.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield to me five minutes?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; I yield five minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, we all recognize, of course, as I certainly did when this resolution came up, the purpose of it, that it was intended to remedy a most distressing and unfortunate condition, and I at the time assumed that it was the best that could be done. Since then certain facts have been brought to my attention which I think it is no more than fair should be suggested to the House. Very likely other Members have heard of the same.

This resolution practically provides that all rents and tenancies now in existence shall continue during the war. I was told recently, since this resolution was passed, of a case—and I presume it is not an isolated one—where a gentleman bought a piece of business property about three years ago which was under a 20-year lease, of which 17 years had run out, leaving, of course, only three years remaining of this long lease. He bought the property with an appreciation of the fact that there were only three years more of the lease to run. The property happened to be located right in the center of the business community, and of course its value had tremendously increased during those 17 years, and of course the original rent was entirely inadequate to the present situation. That gentleman supposed that at the termination of the three years he could charge a rental proportionate to the value of the property. It chances that that 20-year lease is just running out. Under the terms of this resolution the owner of that property could only get the rent which was proper 20 years ago, which would be an insignificant and unfair return on the price which he paid.

Another phase of the situation has also been brought to my attention—and this is natural in the case of every large city, but it is peculiarly true of Washington, considering the abnormal condition of its business property in the last year. There are many people leasing properties under temporary leases month after month far below what is a fair return on their value, and which are only renting temporarily because of unusual conditions, but under this resolution they would continue during the war at that unreasonable rate.

The gentleman from Kentucky will remember that I suggested these inequalities, and he recognized them, and I suggested an amendment to the House amendment, which was not subject to a point of order, providing that the resolution should not apply to business property which was rented at less than 10 per cent gross on its assessed valuation. I did not care what the percentage was, so long as it was a fair income which a man should receive. I am inclined to think the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] agreed with me, and he stated yesterday that he suggested it to the conferees, but that the Senate conferees were unwilling to adopt it. Such an amendment can not be considered in the House now. Even voting down the conference report would not do any good, because we can not amend our own amendments, but I wish to call attention to it.

I can not express my opinion of the action of the Senate conferees in objecting to what seems to me such an exceedingly reasonable and fair and moderate proposition, because it would not be parliamentary for me to state the opinion that I have of their judgment in the matter; but it does seem to me that, although this resolution doubtless originated in a good purpose, yet it is extremely unfortunate that men should be so blinded by the object they have in view that they can not see that this action may create other injustice, not equal, perhaps, to that which it will remedy, but which at the same time might also have been avoided. I think it was very unfortunate that the Senate conferees were unwilling to consider such a suggestion and adopt something along the line of my suggestion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that the disposition of the Senate conferees not to take up the matter of which the gentleman from Massachusetts has just spoken was not because of a lack of sympathy with it, but, if I understand them correctly, they were of the opinion that this resolution, in order to meet hundreds and perhaps thousands of cases which need to be met, should become a law before the 1st of June, and that if time were spent between the House and Senate in buffeting amendments back and forth it would not be passed in time to reach the cases of which I have just spoken. I do not know but what they are right about it. I suggested an amendment, not to deal with rates but with time, which might have met the situation about which the gentleman from Massachusetts has spoken, but there was a disposition not to give any further delay by considering amendments. The amendment of which I spoke dealt wholly with time, and I thought it would not bring about further delay; but, out of apprehension that it would create delay, the Senate conferees were desirous to proceed with the enactment of the resolution in its present form.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LONDON. With the adoption of this resolution all leases which provide for extortionate rent are practically recognized?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Recognized for the life of this resolution; yes. In my opinion, however, where we find one extortion recognized there are hundreds and hundreds of leases in which there is not so much extortion, which will be protected and continued.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] has pointed out one hardship that is worked by this measure. While that is true, and while it demonstrates that this legislation is not adequate to meet this emergency, upon the other hand, this bill absolutely authorizes and will continue to authorize profiteering in the city of Washington. There is nothing in this bill that will prevent those who have leases from subletting rooms within the premises that they have leased at any kind of a price that they may wish to dictate. That is the trouble about this measure. It is a pure makeshift, and to my mind is going to be the means of preventing any further legislation upon this subject. Testimony has been offered before the Committee on Appropriations which discloses the fact that within the next six or eight months there will be at least 27,000 additional clerks coming into the city of Washington to take up this war work, 75 per cent of whom it is estimated will be women. There is nothing in this measure that will protect a single one of these women against this profiteering scheme.

I have appealed to the District Commissioners hoping that possibly some relief might be had through them. They are anxious that some relief be had, but it seems that they have no power by which they may give it. I suggested that it might be well to shut off the appropriations for the city of Washington until such time as the people of the city of Washington will themselves take this thing in hand and the public press expose the outrages that are being daily committed here. I find that it is not only the owners of real estate who are resorting to this profiteering business, but now, to give it a tone of respectability, the banks of this town are likewise engaging in it. They have served notice on these clerks that they will charge them 50 cents a month for taking care of their accounts, unless they agree to keep $100 in the bank continuously. I am glad to say, however, that there are a few banks that spurn this proposition and resent the idea that they are 50-cent banks. Yet there are national banks, with charters from the United States Government to conduct a banking business in the city of Washington, that are refusing to accept accounts until they are paid 50 cents for the acceptance, and under an agreement that the depositors are to pay 50 cents per month as long as they keep their accounts there unless they continuously have $100 on deposit; and these depositors do not receive any interest upon their deposits. This is the condition that we are confronting in the city of Washington, and it should appeal to every man in this House and to every man in the other body that something should be done to relieve this situation. It is not exceptional. It seems to be the general rule.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Why do not they put their money in the postal savings bank?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They have to put their money some place where they can get at it occasionally.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not this practice prevail in all the banks all over the United States?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It does not.

Mr. MADDEN. It does.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It may prevail in Chicago, but it does not prevail in any city that I know of in the State of Indiana, and it did not prevail in the city of Washington before this war began.

Mr. MADDEN. All the banks in the United States pay interest on all deposits of over $1,000, or nearly all of them.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That may be true when the deposit amounts to $1,000.

Mr. MADDEN. And when they run down below the point where they can afford to keep the account, they charge the depositor something in order to recoup them for the interest they pay on the larger accounts.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. And that is the sacrifice the great banking system of this country is making for the war in the city of Washington. I want to say that before this war began these banks were soliciting every clerk who came to this city and soliciting every Congressman who came to this city for the purpose of getting their accounts, and there was no question raised about paying 50 cents a month. They were also bidding and promising that they would give interest on balances.

Mr. MADDEN. Under the law recently passed, perhaps the banks will give this money to the Red Cross.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They may and may not, and I expect not.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I want to ask the gentleman a question about rental property. As I understand, that is the matter to be covered by this bill. Injustice no doubt is done, as stated many times on the floor. The wife of an Army officer brings this case to my attention. She rented the property two years ago at so much per month. She has changed tenants in two years, and had a profit of $159, with expenses amounting to some $1,700. She will be unable to rent that property for more than 10 per cent above what she has been getting in the last two years. She is not a profiteer. It may be that the person who owns the lease on her property is renting rooms for large sums and might be called a profiteer, but the property owner is not getting enough to pay the interest and taxes above the expenses on the property.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That shows the impossibility of this bill doing justice.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana two minutes more; but at the same time I wish to express the hope that there will be no disposition to extend the time beyond what I have, because I intend to move the previous question when my time expires.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Does the gentleman know of any Congressman that has more than $100 to put in the bank?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Not many, under present Washington prices. The very fact stated by the gentleman from Kansas suggests the practice that is prevailing. There are cases where people have leased an apartment consisting of six or seven rooms and have sublet one room for more money than they are paying for the entire apartment. There are examples where a husband and wife have an apartment of five or six rooms rented before the war commenced at $45 a month, and they are now letting those rooms for more than enough to keep them at a fashionable hotel. Therefore, I say, there is a crying necessity, if we are to do for these people that are coming here at the behest of the Government, through invitation extended by the public press in almost every county in the United States, to take some steps to see that they will not be held up by these sharks. Something ought to be done whereby the good people of this city can be roused to a sense of the duty they owe not only to themselves but to the city and Nation, and it occurs to me that the Congress of the United States will be lax in its duty unless some measure is passed that will not only right the wrongs that are being done by the real estate owners but right the wrongs that are done and will continue to be done to the army of young men and women coming in here at the invitation of the Government.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, this resolution is a miserable attempt to make the world believe that profiteering is about to be curbed in the District of Columbia. The superior right of the people to the land has never been disputed by the most conservative lawyer. The textbooks on real estate lay down the principle that as far as title to the land is concerned that the people collectively, and the State, as the representative of the people, have the absolute and superior title. I understand that a committee of New York women contemplate coming to Washington to see the President to ask him to adopt some measure, or propose some measure, to protect them against exploitation by landlords. Whatever differences of opinion there may be about the right of the State to exercise control of property in the interest of the common weal, there should be no doubt as to the right of the people to exercise supreme authority wherever land is involved, wherever real estate is involved.

This resolution provides that the terms of present leases shall continue. It sanctifies every act of extortion committed by the landlords of this city against tenants. It rewards every effort made by owners, lessees, sublessees, and subsublessees to increase rents. It will to an extent prevent further increases of rent in this city in those cases only where there are leases now, but it provides no relief to the new tenant, and leaves the landlord here in full enjoyment of the extortionate rents exacted by now existing leases.

War is a mighty radical proposition. When we deal with war the strange thing about it is that the very same legislative body that has taken the most radical step that a nation can take, a step from peace into war, that the very same reject as too radical the necessary reconstruction steps essential to put things on a proper basis.

There is no solution of the evil short of the radical solution, and that is control of rent by the people collectively. There is no other way to save the people from exploitation. The absurdity of unrestricted private greed in the ownership of land is evident here. It is evident in the city of New York with its tenement houses.

Some absentee landlord who does not even live in New York exploits the families of the boys who are giving their lives to the country. What a misfortune, what a calamity, that men refuse to think along new lines. There is no way out except the public control of land. The land belongs to the people collectively. In this supreme crisis of the world the people should assert themselves and should say to the owners of the territory, "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther. We shall not permit you to exploit the people." The mere fact that we have inherited a law respecting private property from old times does not mean that we shall refuse to adapt our laws and institutions to the imperative needs of the day, and the unmistakable command of the hour is that the very same State, the very same Government, which calls upon the citizen to give his life should exercise its public power over private property, and particularly private property in land, for the public good. The landlords have not created the land. The profiteers have not made it. It is and should be the heritage of all. It should never be permitted to be used by one group as a means of oppression of the rest. As a first step, the Government must fix a limit to rent charges.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, repeating the thought of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON], who has just spoken, in my judgment this resolution says to perhaps some thousands of profiteers, "Thus far shalt thou go, but no farther." I am fully conscious of the fact that many exceptions to the general rule laid down in this resolution can be found where injury may be worked, but, as I just said, there are at least a hundred instances where good may come out of it for every one where harm may come from it. If the criticism which has just been advanced toward this resolution should be extended to the tax laws of the country, there would be no tax laws anywhere in the United States. A tax law that does not work injustice somewhere has never been invented by man, and never will be. I believe that this resolution is the best that can be gotten out of the situation for the present. Just exactly four months ago to-day I introduced a bill to curb profiteering, but the profiteers and their allies have found a way to postpone it from day to day until they hope that Congress will adjourn and leave the tenants without remedy, leave them open to profiteering without any sort of protection, not only a part of them but all of them.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Has the gentleman much hope that his bill will be taken up seriously by the Senate?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I not only entertain much hope but I feel confident that a majority of the Senate intends to see to it that a proper antiprofiteering law is passed before this Congress has adjourned.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I ask indefinite leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. ESTOPINAL, on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks indefinite leave of absence for his colleague, Gen. ESTOPINAL. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 10854, the Naval appropriation bill, disagree to all of the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Naval appropriation bill, disagree to all of the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to get a little information. I notice on page 54 there is an amendment providing $9,150,000 for a new nitrate plant. I think the House should have some information in regard to that amendment.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman that I am not advised of it myself, but in the preliminary conference with the Members who will compose the conference committee we decided to investigate that and be able to give the House facts, if we should report it, or if we should decline to agree to it, the reasons why we declined.

Mr. SNELL. Was there any application made before the House Naval Committee for this appropriation?

Mr. PADGETT. There was not.

Mr. SNELL. And the gentleman has no information in respect to this?

Mr. PADGETT. No; and I understand there were no hearings before the Senate committee that are printed.

Mr. SNELL. I have sent for them, and I could not get them.

Mr. PADGETT. The conferees on the part of the House propose to investigate the matter and be prepared to give the House full information.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman not think that should come back and that there should be a vote upon it in the House—as large a proposition as that?

Mr. PADGETT. I have no objection to it. If it becomes necessary to do it, or if anyone desires it, we will give the House full information on the matter.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes, under the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, never before to my knowledge has an appropriation bill been returned to the House with so many amendments of such diverse character as this bill, carrying 170 different amendments. They range from private claims to amendment of the patent laws, to a change in organization in the Dental Corps, increase of line officers, provision for a nitrate plant, just referred to, involving $9,000,000, millions of dollars of appropriations for additional land to naval stations, which, in my opinion, are not necessary; provisions for the Government to go into the promoting business for establishing railroads; provisions for all kind and manner of activities, many of which are foreign to the work of the Navy Department. We have included in this bill a provision reorganizing the Coast Guard Service for the special purpose of providing an increase in salary during the period of the war of the present officers of that service. We have also an amendment, No. 101, providing for improvements of the quay and power house at Newport, involving an expenditure of $800,000, and an amendment following that, No. 120, for the reorganization, as I said, of the Coast Guard Service. Then there is an amendment also providing for the purchase of a large quantity of land at Key West, Fla., for an aviation field. Many of these sections never have received any consideration on the part of the House at all.

We desire, and it is the one sentiment of this House, that every dollar, even though it runs into the billions, that is necessary for the welfare of our Government and naval equipment in our present crisis should be voted, but we should not launch at this time in the purchase of real estate or any activity which is not needed because of the pressing condition of our war finances, and yet in another body Senators annex amendments which involve, in my opinion, wasteful extravagance, amendments which have never been considered in any committee of their body or any committee of this body. It would be of no avail to keep this bill from being sent to conference, because it would have to come back here, and I know that many of the amendments in the Committee of the Whole would be disagreed to, just as the gentleman plans to disagree to in his request now pending, but I think that before this bill should be agreed to in conference we should have separate votes on amendment numbered 93, which relates to the building of a submarine base at Key West, Fla., involving an appropriation of two and a half million; amendment numbered 100, providing for an appropriation of several hundred thousand dollars to build a railroad with Government aid; amendment numbered 101, providing for land at the torpedo station at Newport, R. I.; and amendment numbered 120, providing for increased salaries and reorganization of the Coast Guard Service; so I ask the gentleman, under the reservation of the right to object, whether he will not be willing to bring these respective amendments back to the House before agreement is had on them in conference?

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman I am practically as much at a loss about this matter as the gentleman himself. As I said before, it is our purpose to inquire very fully into all of these matters and be able to state to the House full information with reference either as to the merits or the demerits of the propositions. I am not prepared to do so now, because many of them we did not consider; they were not submitted to us, and I understand they have arisen since the House committee considered them, but they involve large expenditures, and it is the purpose of the House conferees before they go into conference to have an investigation upon their own responsibility to ascertain, as far as they can, the merits or demerits of these respective propositions.

Mr. STAFFORD. I submit my original request, whether the gentleman is not willing to have a separate vote upon amendments numbered 90, 100, 101, and 120 before any agreement is had upon them in conference?

Mr. WALSH. Before the gentleman answers the question, will the gentleman yield for a further inquiry?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. Is it not a fact that the Naval Affairs Committee have considered the matter of the promotion of the Coast Guard, holding hearings upon the matter, and have reported out a bill?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir; and the bill is on the calendar.

Mr. BUTLER. It is not this bill.

Mr. WALSH. It is a similar bill in its provisions.

Mr. PADGETT. Many of the provisions are the same.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will yield, is not that a reason why we ought not to carry in an appropriation bill an increase for that corps? Is not the very fact there is legislation pending where the matter would be subject to real consideration and amendment, paragraph by paragraph, a reason why the gentleman ought not to carry in an appropriation bill a general provision of pay?

Mr. PADGETT. Well, that is not general; that is a temporary provision during the war with reference to the Coast Guard acting with the Navy during war conditions. If the House desires a vote upon it, of course we will report it back without agreement, and the House will have an opportunity to consider.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish also to include in the request amendment numbered 75, relating to the nitrate plant.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to call the attention of the chairman to amendment numbered 170, which affects a portion of the so-called "stop-watch" limitation. That is a limitation which has been passed upon by this House on some five or six occasions, and I think that we have had perhaps that number of roll calls. I would like to have assurance from the chairman that before yielding on a matter on which the House has expressed itself in such a definite fashion we will have an opportunity to pass upon it in the House.

Mr. PADGETT. I will say to the gentleman it was my purpose to let the House pass upon that proposition for the simple reason that the House and the Senate a number of times have voted upon that question.

Mr. KEATING. Now, may I call his attention to amendments numbered 37 and 47, which would give to the Commandant of the Marine Corps the rank of lieutenant general and to three heads of bureaus of that corps the rank of major general. That matter was brought before the House when the naval bill was up and an amendment offered, as I recall, by the chairman and withdrawn when objection was made. The proposition, as I understand it——

Mr. PADGETT. Only one of those—the question of the lieutenant general—was not before the House.

Mr. KEATING. Yes; the question of lieutenant general was not before the House, but this question of giving the rank of major general to three members of the staff of the Marine Corps was discussed before the House and the amendment was withdrawn. I do not desire to go into a discussion of that matter at this time. I have a very great admiration for the Marine Corps, but I would like to see the promotions go to the men in the Marine Corps who fight, instead of granting promotions to men who remain here in Washington, some of whom have never been under fire.

Mr. MONDELL. And never will be.

Mr. KEATING. And under those circumstances I think that for the good name of the Marine Corps, as well as for the satisfaction of the House, we should have a chance to discuss this matter before the committee yield to the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. In view of the very great number and very great importance of the Senate amendments would it not be well to have the Committee on Naval Affairs take the bill into that committee and consider it carefully before the full committee?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know of anything to be gained by that, sir. It is the purpose of the conferees to have hearings and investigation.

Mr. MONDELL. It is a pretty large responsibility to place on a few men, distinguished as they are, and informed as they are, and as wise as they are, to determine about $9,000,000 nitrate plants that we have never heard of; to decide whether or no we are going to win this war with admirals and generals and other officers of high rank and pay; to determine whether or no we are going to make these enormous appropriations that were not suggested at the time the bill was before the House. That is rather a considerable responsibility, and it occurs to me that the gentlemen who would be on the conference committee would prefer to share their responsibility with their colleagues of the committee.

Mr. PADGETT. The usual course has been that if a bill is referred to the committee the committee reports it back with a general recommendation that the amendments be disagreed to and go to conference. But the committee would not take specific action as to what should be done and what should not be done in a mandatory way, because they would have to confer with the Senate.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentlemen who are to be members of the conference committee would have the benefit of the opinion of their colleagues who are familiar with these subjects, and they would be armed with the information and advice that could be obtained in a committee meeting.

Mr. PADGETT. The conferees on the naval bill heretofore have availed themselves of the opportunity to confer with their members from time to time.

Mr. MONDELL. Are there any considerable number of important items in this bill that are made available before the beginning of the present fiscal year?

Mr. PADGETT. Every one of them is, by one provision that the House passed and the Senate passed, and that is not in conference.

But it provides it is not good for deficiencies. It only made everything available immediately, but it will be practically the first of the year before the bill will be signed.

Mr. MONDELL. That is not tremendously important.

Mr. PADGETT. That is not in conference anyway, because both bodies have passed it.

Mr. MONDELL. What I had in mind was this, namely, assuming it took a little more time if the bill went to the committee, and it would not necessarily take any more time than to have it go to conference now, but assuming it would take a day or two longer, that would not in any way embarrass or hamper the naval authorities, and at the same time the gentlemen who would be on the conference committee would have the benefit of the advice and counsel of all the members of the committee on these very important matters. If they were ordinary increases, providing for plans and purposes which the committee had in mind when the bill was considered, and which the House considered at the time, it would be one thing, but many of them are quite radical. A number are entirely new propositions.

Mr. PADGETT. There are not many new ones. The great proportion of money is simply for additions to the amounts which the committee had recommended and which the House had passed.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the question of adding a very large number of permanent officers of very high grade to certain organizations is one that the House has never passed favorably upon or discussed at all, and it occurs to me that the gentleman and his fellow conferees would be glad to have the advice of the members of the committee on that important subject, as well as on the subject of new manufacturing plants.

Mr. PADGETT. I think I may say upon that question of the proposed increase that it involves the addition of large numbers of permanent officers, and the conferees on the part of the House are in accord with what I understand to be the views of the gentleman in his comments.

Mr. MONDELL. I am glad to know that, and I assumed that that was the case, but I am anxious to strengthen the hands of the gentlemen of the committee in carrying out their determination in that matter.

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know that that would add to the strength of it.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. MONDELL. One more question, if I may. Do I understand it was the intention of the conferees to have hearings on these subjects and go into them more as it would be done if the bill went to the committee?

Mr. PADGETT. That is our purpose, sir.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not want to embarrass the conferees, but if that is to be done, why not do it before the full committee. I am rather inclined to defer to the opinion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER], the ranking Republican member of the committee, in that matter.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Tennessee, the chairman of the committee, yield me a minute or two?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, if I can have the attention of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], I will say that I think he may have learned from the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee what his purpose is concerning these amendments—the important ones—that have already been talked about here this morning. But let me, in the presence of the gentleman, ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs whether it is not his purpose to have brought back here in this House, that the views of the House may be first received before the conferees agree to them, to the amendments Nos. 37 and 47, the ones referred to by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING]? There is also here——

Mr. MONDELL. That is, unless the Senate recedes.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, yes; but the conferees——

Mr. PADGETT. We might agree on one line and disagree on another.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if I may?

Mr. BUTLER. In a moment. That I may make myself plain, may I ask before the conferees agree to the two amendments referred to by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING], and before the conferees agree to the Senate amendment increasing the permanent Navy, as proposed by the Senate, in all of these amendments, whether or not the House shall have the opportunity of voting?

Mr. PADGETT. Unless the Senate should recede.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand. But "before we agree," was the question. I understand the views of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs; but inasmuch as many gentlemen are interested and are asking many questions, I put it in this way, whether or not the House shall have an opportunity to express itself on such amendments?

Mr. PADGETT. Unless the Senate receded, that would be brought back to the House.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman add to his suggestion the amendment in regard to the nitrate plant?

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman how he can hold hearings on these subjects in the conference unless the Senate conferees agree to hold hearings?

Mr. PADGETT. We just simply hold them ourselves before we go into conference with the Senate.

Mr. MADDEN. The conferees would not hold hearings?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MADDEN. Can the gentleman speak for the conferees of both Houses?

Mr. PADGETT. Not for the conferees of the Senate. The House conferees propose to hold their own hearings.

Mr. MADDEN. It seems to me that would not do any good. What we ought to do would be to have hearings held by the conference.

Mr. PADGETT. The conferees would hold their hearings for their own information and for their guidance, and secure information upon which they would base their action, and report to the House.

Mr. BUTLER. And those hearings will be printed, may I ask the chairman?

Mr. PADGETT. They will.

Mr. BUTLER. So that the gentleman will have a chance to see them.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. DYER. I wish to ask a question in regard to amendment 23. That is an amendment providing for the reorganization of the Dental Corps of the Navy. This has substantially the same effect on the Dental Corps of the Navy as the legislation already enacted for the Dental Corps of the Army?

Mr. PADGETT. I am not informed as to the status with reference to the Army. I do not know of any legislation that has been enacted, but it is legislation that is desired.

Mr. DYER. I will say to the gentleman that we enacted legislation at the last session of this Congress with reference to the reorganization of the Dental Corps of the Army that put the Dental Corps on the same plane in every respect as the Medical Corps of the Army, and I hope this amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. I will say to the gentleman that I advocate and always have advocated that the two services should be kept upon a parity. One thing, however, has been noticeable, and I have combatted it at different times, and that is that the two services have been played against each other. They will get an amendment or legislation for one service that makes them a little better than the other. Then the other comes and seeks to get legislation to put them, as they say, on the same basis, and goes a little higher. Then the other comes back and repeats the process. I have combatted that from time to time, and have insisted that they should be on an equality and a parity.

Mr. DYER. What the gentleman refers to is the Dental Corps of the Army and the Dental Corps of the Navy, I take it?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know whether this proposed legislation puts them upon an equality or not. I have this information, however, or I have been told, that the Navy Department prepared a bill and submitted it which did put them upon a parity, and this legislation as proposed in this amendment to the Naval bill increased very largely the proposals submitted by the Navy Department, which, they said, puts the two services on a parity.

Mr. STAFFORD. I want that amendment included also in my request.

Mr. DYER. I just wanted to get the gentleman's views, he being chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, with reference to this amendment. It is an amendment which is recommended by the Navy Department.

Mr. PADGETT. No; that amendment is not recommended by the Navy Department.

Mr. DYER. In substance?

Mr. PADGETT. Not in substance. They have recommended a part of it.

Mr. DYER. I introduced a bill in the House and Senator TILLMAN introduced a bill in the Senate and it is, in effect, the same as this amendment.

Mr. PADGETT. No; there is a very material and substantial difference between them.

Mr. DYER. In what respect?

Mr. PADGETT. It is not necessary to discuss it now. I had a conference with the Secretary of the Navy this morning, and he called my attention to it and said that he did not approve of the legislation that is proposed in this bill, but that he had sent down a bill, which had been introduced by Senator TILLMAN, which embodied the recommendations of the Navy Department, and I believe I have a memorandum of it. That is Senate bill 3049.

Mr. DYER. That is the one I mentioned.

Mr. PADGETT. That is very different from the legislation proposed in this amendment.

Mr. DYER. I trust that out of this situation—this amendment and the bill referred to—there will be something enacted that will be for the benefit of the Dental Corps, because they are doing great work.

Mr. Speaker, Senate amendment No. 23, having to do with the Dental Corps of the Navy, is a splendid amendment, and I hope it will be agreed to by the conferees. It ought, in substance, to be enacted into law. It is similar to the bill (H. R. 10724) that I introduced on March 14 last.

The Dental Corps of the Navy and the Dental Corps of the Army have not till very lately received much consideration from the Congress. Last session we passed a bill that has done much for the Army as regards the Dental Corps. This amendment, if agreed to, will help the Dental Corps of the Navy. There ought to be one dental officer in the Army and one in the Navy for each 500 instead of, as now, one for each 1,000.

I think this matter of great importance and that it concerns our country specially at this time. That the Members of Congress and others interested may have the fullest knowledge possible for me to give them, I include here the amendment No. 23 referred to, and also the bill (H. R. 10724) that I introduced some time ago. They are as follows.

Senate amendment No. 23 to naval appropriation bill.

That the act approved August 29, 1916, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes" (Stat. L., vol. 39, ch. 417, pp. 573, 574), be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out all of said act following the caption "Naval Dental Corps," on page 573, but preceding the caption "Dental Reserve Corps," on page 574, and by substituting therefor the following:

"That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint and commission, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, dental officers in the Navy at the rate of 1 for each 1,000 of the total authorized number of officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps, in the grades of assistant dental surgeon, passed assistant dental surgeon, dental surgeon, and dental inspector, who shall constitute the Naval Dental Corps, and shall be a part of the Medical Department of the Navy. Original appointments to the Naval Dental Corps shall be made in the grade of assistant dental surgeon with the rank of lieutenant (junior grade), and all dental officers now in the Dental Corps appointed under the provisions of the act of Congress approved August 22, 1912 (Stat. L., vol. 37, p. 345), or under the provisions of the act of Congress approved August 29, 1916 (Stat. L., vol. 39, p. 573), or who may hereafter be appointed, shall take rank and precedence with officers of the Naval Medical Corps of the same rank according to the dates of their original appointments, and all such dental officers shall be eligible for advancement in grade and rank in the same manner and under the same conditions as officers of the Naval Medical Corps with or next after whom they take precedence, and shall receive the same pay and allowances as officers of corresponding rank and length of service in the Naval Medical Corps up to and including the rank of commander: Provided, That dental surgeons shall be eligible for advancement in pay and allowances, but not in rank, to and including the pay and allowances of captain, subject to such examinations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, except that the number of dental inspectors with the pay and allowances of captain shall not exceed 4½ per cent, and the number of dental inspectors with the rank, pay, and allowances of commander shall not exceed 8 per cent of the total authorized number of dental officers: Provided further, That dental officers shall be eligible for advancement to the pay and allowances of captain when their total active service as dental officers in the Navy is such that if rendered as officers of the Naval Medical Corps it would place them in the list of medical officers with the pay and allowances of captain: And provided further, That dental officers who shall have gained or lost numbers on the Navy list shall be considered to have gained or lost service accordingly; and the time served by dental officers on active duty as acting assistant dental surgeons and assistant dental surgeons under provisions of law existing prior to the passage of this act shall be reckoned in computing the increased service pay and service for promotion of dental officers herein or heretofore authorized.

"All appointees authorized by this act shall be citizens of the United States between 21 and 32 years of age, and shall be graduates of standard medical or dental colleges and trained in the several branches of dentistry, and shall, before appointment, have successfully passed mental, moral, physical, and professional examinations before medical and professional examining boards appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, and have been recommended for appointment by such boards: Provided, That hereafter no person shall be appointed as assistant surgeon in the Navy who is not a graduate of a standard medical college.

"Officers of the Naval Dental Corps shall become eligible for retirement in the same manner and under the same conditions as now prescribed by law for officers of the Naval Medical Corps, except that section 1445 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall not be applicable to dental officers, and they shall not be entitled to rank above commander on the retired list, or to retired pay above that of captain.

"All dental officers now serving under probationary appointments shall become immediately eligible for permanent appointment under the provisions of this act, subject to the examinations prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy for original appointment as dental surgeon, and may be appointed assistant dental surgeon with the rank of lieutenant (junior grade) to rank from the date of their probationary appointments: Provided, That the senior dental officer now at the United States Naval Academy shall not be displaced by the provisions of this act, and he shall hereafter have the grade of dental surgeon and the rank, pay, and allowances of lieutenant commander, and he shall not be eligible for retirement before he has reached the age of 70 years, except for physical disability incurred in the line of duty: Provided further, That no dental officer in the Navy who on original appointment as dental officer was over 40 years of age shall be eligible for retirement before he has reached the age of 70 years, except for physical disability incurred in line of duty.

"All acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act relating to the Dental Corps of the Navy are hereby repealed: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to legislate out of the service any officer now in the Medical Department of the Navy or to reduce the rank, pay, or allowances now authorized by law for any officer of the Navy."

All appointments or promotions provided for in this amendment shall be by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The bill H. R. 10724, introduced by Mr. DYER March 14, 1918:

A bill (H. R. 10724) to reorganize the Dental Corps of the Navy, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved August 29, 1916, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes" (Stat. L., vol. 39, ch. 417, pp. 573, 574), be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out all of said act following the caption "Naval Dental Corps," on page 573, but preceding the caption "Dental Reserve Corps," on page 574, and by substituting therefor the following:

"That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint and commission, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, dental officers in the Navy at the rate of one for each thousand of the total authorized number of officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps, in the grades of assistant dental surgeon, passed assistant dental surgeon, and dental surgeon, who shall constitute the Naval Dental Corps, and shall be a part of the Medical Department of the Navy. Original appointments to the Naval Dental Corps shall be made in the grade of assistant dental surgeon with the rank of lieutenant (junior grade), and all dental officers now in the Dental Corps, appointed under the provisions of the act of Congress approved August 29, 1916 (Stat. L., vol. 39, p. 573), or who may hereafter be appointed, shall take rank and precedence with officers of the Naval Medical Corps of the same rank according to the dates of their respective commissions, and dental officers shall be eligible for advancement in grade and rank in the same manner and under the same conditions as officers of the Naval Medical Corps with or next after whom they take precedence, and shall receive the same pay and allowances as officers of corresponding rank and length of service in the Naval Medical Corps up to and including the rank of lieutenant commander: Provided, That dental surgeons shall be eligible for advancement in pay and allowances, but not in rank, to and including the pay and allowances of captain, subject to such examinations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, except that the number of dental surgeons with the pay and allowances of captain shall not exceed 4½ per cent and the number of dental surgeons with the pay and allowances of commander shall not exceed 8 per cent of the total authorized number of dental officers: Provided further, That dental surgeons shall be eligible for advancement to the pay and allowances of commander and captain when their total active service as dental officers in the Navy is such that if rendered as officers of the Naval Medical Corps it would place them in the list of medical officers with the rank, pay, and allowances of commander or captain, as the case may be: And provided further, That dental officers who shall have gained or lost numbers on the Navy list shall be considered to have gained or lost service accordingly; and the time served by dental officers on active duty as acting assistant dental surgeons and assistant dental surgeons under provisions of law existing prior to the passage of this act shall be reckoned in computing the increased service pay and service for promotion of dental officers herein authorized or heretofore appointed.

"All appointees authorized by this act shall be citizens of the United States between 21 and 32 years of age, and shall be graduates of standard medical or dental colleges and trained in the several branches of dentistry, and shall, before appointment, have successfully passed mental, moral, physical, and professional examinations before medical and professional examining boards appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, and have been recommended for appointment by such boards: Provided, That hereafter no person shall be appointed as assistant surgeon in the Navy who is not a graduate of a standard medical college.

"Officers of the Naval Dental Corps shall become eligible for retirement in the same manner and under the same conditions as now prescribed by law for officers of the Naval Medical Corps, except that section 1445 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall not be applicable to dental officers, and they shall not be entitled to rank above lieutenant commander on the retired list, or to retired pay above that of captain.

"All dental officers now serving under probationary appointments shall become immediately eligible for permanent appointment under the provisions of this act, subject to the examinations prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy for original appointment as dental surgeon, and may be appointed assistant dental surgeon with the rank of lieutenant (junior grade) to rank from date of their probationary appointments: Provided, That the senior dental officer now at the United States Naval Academy shall not be displaced by the provisions of this act, and he shall hereafter have the grade of passed assistant dental surgeon and the rank, pay, and allowances of lieutenant, and he shall not be eligible for retirement before he has reached the age of 70 years, except for physical disability incurred in the line of duty: Provided further, That no dental officer in the Navy who on original appointment as dental officer was over 40 years of age shall be eligible for retirement before he has reached the age of 70 years, except for physical disability incurred in line of duty.

"All acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to reduce the rank, pay, or allowances now authorized by law for any officer of the Navy."

Mr. PADGETT. I have stated to the gentleman that my purpose and idea was at all times to keep the two services on a parity, but I am opposed to seesawing one above the other.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. It takes unanimous consent, for the reason that a single objection would send this to the committee?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman has told the House that the conferees on the part of the House would investigate touching these new items?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; not only those, but others, very thoroughly. There are a number of them that I have no information or knowledge about.

Mr. CANNON. If they were investigated the House would pass, under the five-minute rule, upon the merits of the proposition.

Now, then, so far as I am concerned, I want to say that if we are to stay here all summer there is plenty of time to let this bill take the ordinary course under the rules of the House, reserving all the privileges of the House to pass upon the Senate amendments. If we are to have a revenue bill, I think that would be the proper course. I do not know whether we are or not. I think we could expedite the passage of this bill very greatly by complying with the gentleman's request, but perhaps with less intelligence as to the Senate amendments, considering the temper of the House. I am "up in the air." Yesterday morning I was stepping high and thought we might get through and get away from here before the dog days. I was pessimistic about it last night, and now I am in doubt. Has the gentleman any information that would remove the doubt?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir; I have no information. The only suggestion I could make is that the sooner we dispose of this bill and get it enacted into law, the sooner we will get that much out of the way.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I come out at the same hole that I went in at. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. It will be useful to the military service, will it not, by way of obtaining enlistments for both the Navy and Marine Corps, to put this bill through as quickly as we can, without, of course, taking advantage of the House?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. I will say to the gentleman that I think the bill ought to be put through as quickly as we can do it, but at the same time I do not want to be hurried to do things that I do not know about. For that reason I want to investigate these matters.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, permit me to direct the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] to the fact that the House expedited the passage of this bill when it was before it by dispensing with general debate and by limiting the debate under the five-minute rule to the items of the bill, and we did not delay it. Now it comes back with a lot of new provisions which were not considered in the House or in the committee, and the colloquy that has taken place here this morning seems to me to demonstrate that, whether we expedite the passage of the bill or not, the House would be in a position more intelligently to consider it if we were to send it to the Committee on Naval Affairs. It will not delay it more than a couple of days, and I think that is the proper course to pursue.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

ADDITIONAL URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SHERLEY, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 12280) making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report (No. 605), ordered to be printed.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts reserves all points of order.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman from Kentucky state how much this bill carries?

Mr. SHERLEY. One hundred and twenty-three million dollars.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I renew the request I made before with reference to the naval appropriation bill—to disagree to all the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to disagree to all the Senate amendments to the naval appropriation bill and to agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

Mr. PADGETT. I want to state again what I stated a while ago—that it is our purpose to investigate these matters fully and clearly, to have everything in printed form for the benefit of the Members of the House, and with the reservations that were made in the discussion here I have no disposition to run anything over the House. There are many things here that I am as anxious to know about as any man in the House can be.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, in view of the statement made by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I want to ask him if, when they come to consider these numerous amendments, relating to propositions about which they may have some doubt themselves, and which are not included in the amendments that have been brought to our attention heretofore, he and his fellow conferees will feel at liberty to refer them to the House without a specific request? I have in mind one or two matters that I think the conferees may have some difficulty in agreeing upon.

Mr. PADGETT. I will say to the gentleman that unless I am clearly satisfied of the correctness and rightfulness and propriety of agreeing to any amendment we will disagree and submit it to the House.

Mr. BUTLER. And if the chairman of the committee should find among the House conferees a decided difference, would he be willing to submit the question to the House?

Mr. PADGETT. Certainly. We have always pursued that course.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. PADGETT, Mr. TALBOTT, Mr. RIORDAN, Mr. BUTLER, and Mr. BROWNING.

ILLINOIS CENTENNIAL 50-CENT PIECES.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 8764) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the admission of the State of Illinois into the Union, which has come back with a Senate amendment, and to concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 8764, with a Senate amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was reported, as follows:

On page 1, line 14, strike out the word "minor" and insert the words "subsidiary silver."

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that the title of that bill should be amended.

Mr. HAYDEN. I think not, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. All right then.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to submit some remarks on amendment 23 to the naval appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to submit them now?

Mr. DYER. No; to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on amendment 23 to the naval appropriation bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks which I made this morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MINING ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of Senate bill 2812.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think that motion is necessary. The bill is the special order.

The SPEAKER. This bill has the right of way, but the language of the order was not like that which is contained in some orders—that the House shall automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The Chair thinks the motion of the gentleman from Oklahoma is proper.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 2812, to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain, with Mr. DEWALT in the chair.

The Clerk, resuming the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 10. That upon establishing to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that valuable deposits of oil or gas have been discovered within the limits of the land embraced in any permit, the permittee shall be entitled to a lease for one-fourth of the land embraced in the prospecting permit, such area to be selected by the permittee in compact form and if surveyed, to be described by the legal subdivisions of the public-land surveys; if unsurveyed, to be surveyed by the Government at the expense of the applicant for lease in accordance with the laws, rules, and regulations governing the survey of public land, and the lands leased shall be conformed to and taken in accordance with the legal subdivisions of such surveys; deposits made to cover expense of surveys shall be deemed appropriated for that purpose and any excess deposits may be repaid to the person or persons making such deposit or their legal representatives. Such leases shall be for a term of 20 years with the right of renewal as prescribed in section 12 hereof upon a royalty of one-eighth in amount or value of the production and the annual payment in advance of a rental of $1 per acre, the rental paid for any one year to be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year. The permittee shall also be entitled to a preference right to a lease for the remainder of the land in the prospecting permit at such royalty, not less than one-eighth, as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, for such periods and under such other conditions as are fixed for oil or gas leases in this act.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, on page 37, in line 20, I move to strike out the words "or persons" and insert in lieu thereof the words "association or corporation," so as to conform with the first section of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Page 37, line 20, strike out the words "or persons" and insert in lieu thereof the words "association or corporation."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The chairman of the committee will notice that in section 9 there is no limitation as to the number of prospecting permits.

Mr. FERRIS. In what line?

Mr. ELSTON. In line 16. The language there grants to any applicant qualified under the act a prospecting permit. I have not noticed anything in the section relating to a limitation of the number of prospecting permits. It is true that on page 46 there is a limitation that not more than three leases in each State shall be issued. I would like to ask the chairman whether he thinks that language on page 46, line 20, is sufficient to make it clear that there may be granted by the Secretary of the Interior three prospecting permits at any one time in any one State.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not think the committee ever intended or agreed to that.

Mr. ELSTON. Oh, yes.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not think so as to permits.

Mr. ELSTON. How could you have three leases unless three permits had been granted?

Mr. FERRIS. You could have them on small tracts. Suppose the prospecting permit is issued and the prospector gets one quarter, and suppose they wanted to take two or three leases of the smaller area, even though they had but one permit, they could get them, because the leases are held down to a smaller area than the prospecting permits. We only provided for the leasing of oil for 640-acre tracts, but the prospecting permit can go as high as 2,560 acres and upward. Some domes in Wyoming only have 640 acres in the whole dome.

Mr. ELSTON. The lease would cover everything that the permittee put up to the Secretary of the Interior as being worth while to cover in a lease. It would only be one transaction.

Mr. FERRIS. The holder of a prospect permit only gets one quarter at a fixed royalty as a bonus or reward for discovery, but he has a preference right to taking the remaining three-fourths, if he desires to do so, at a royalty which may be in excess of one-eighth, and it puts him into competition with others as to the remaining sections.

Mr. ELSTON. I would like to reserve the right to ask unanimous consent at the proper time to return to this section and discuss the question.

Mr. FERRIS. I would rather not leave it open, but if the gentleman finds——

Mr. ELSTON. The gentleman will remember that we grant five prospecting permits in reference to Alaska, and that I justified yesterday on the ground that we permitted three permits to each State.

Mr. FERRIS. I remember the gentleman referred to that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, I think when the chairman of the committee reflects he will find he is in error. We granted five prospecting permits to Alaska, and we talked about it in committee that we should grant five prospecting permits to Alaska and that we granted only three in the States.

Mr. FERRIS. Suppose the gentleman prepares an amendment and we can take up the return to it later.

Mr. CRAMTON. Is it not possible that without any limitation placed there it will be held that there is no limit and that you are not restricted to any number?

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman will recall that in the closing hours we made changes in the bill quite hurriedly, and if gentlemen will be good enough to draw their amendment we can consider going back to it later.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, on page 37, line 20, I move to strike out the word "may" and insert the word "shall." I feel that the Government ought to pay back the excess moneys that they require a man to advance. There is no reason why it should be left in that form.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 37, line 20, strike out the word "may" and insert the word "shall."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if the amendments offered by the oil men as they were finally agreed upon are found in the confidential print of the bill I hold?

Mr. FERRIS. I think they are.

Mr. MONDELL. I have been unable to find these amendments as they were finally submitted unless they be in this confidential print.

Mr. FERRIS. I think they are in there. It may be that the oil men had one or two that the gentleman will not find there. What happened was this: The oil men came here and we gave them a long hearing and they presented a number of amendments. They presented them ably and were very much in earnest about them, and as chairman of the committee I had them printed as a part of the bill confidentially so that they would have full consideration. Some of them were agreed to in committee and many of them were not.

Mr. MONDELL. In the matter of this particular section, the amendments offered by the Colorado, California, and Wyoming oil men were agreed to in purpose, but not in substance. This rewritten section accomplishes vital changes in the character of this bill. It makes it, in fact, an oil-leasing bill, divorces it entirely from the character of a sale bill. That, in my opinion, is a very wise change, one that I have suggested heretofore on both occasions when the bill was before the committee as something that ought to be accomplished.

I want to make this suggestion, however, that in making the change from the granting of a freehold to that granting a lease at a fixed royalty the committee might well have given a lease for the entire area at a fixed royalty as the oil men asked.

The original bill gave a patent to one-quarter of the lands embraced in the prospecting permit, and as that was supposed to be a valuable grant the committee might very well in changing from a freehold to a lease have given at a fixed royalty a larger acreage than it gave under a patent. I trust in conference this will be done. I do think, however, that the last part of this section should be strengthened, unless it is certain to be construed by the department in a liberal way. It reads:

The permittee shall also be entitled to a preference right to a lease for the remainder of the land in the prospecting permit at such royalty, not less than one-eighth, as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, for such periods and under such other conditions as are fixed for oil or gas leases in this act.

That is a pretty definite statement, and it certainly ought to indicate to the Secretary of the Interior the congressional opinion as to the wisdom of dealing liberally with these permittees. They are the people who will do the wildcatting in the oil business. They will take all of the desperate chances. They will bring in all of the new territory, and they are entitled to have very liberal treatment. Under a fair construction of the section as it has been rewritten they will have liberal treatment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. There is no good reason why the prospecting permit should be limited to an area of that size except in developed territory. Therefore the importance of departing from the 10-mile provision in the former section and confining the operation of the 640-acre permit limitation to those areas that have either been developed or where the geological structure is such as to make it reasonably certain that oil will be developed at a reasonable depth in paying quantities.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That all permits and leases of lands containing or supposed to contain oil or gas, made or issued under the provisions of this act, shall be subject to the condition that no wells shall be drilled within 200 feet of any of the outer boundaries of the lands embraced within any permit or lease unless the adjoining lands have theretofore been patented or the title thereto otherwise vested in private owners, or unless the lessees or patentees of such adjoining lands shall, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, agree to the drilling of wells and removal of the oil or gas from the 200-foot tracts or reservations herein created, and to the further condition that the permittee or lessee will, in conducting his explorations and mining operations, use all reasonable precautions to prevent waste of oil or gas developed in the land, or the entrance of water through wells drilled by him to the oil sands or oil-bearing strata, to the destruction or injury of the oil deposits. Violations of the provisions of this section shall constitute grounds for the forfeiture of the permit or lease, to be enforced through appropriate proceedings in courts of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Is there not a clerical error in line 3, page 39? The language reads, "proceedings in courts of competent jurisdiction." I wonder if that would not better be "proceedings in a court of competent jurisdiction." Under the language in the bill if a man's land extended over the divisions of counties, you could put him in three or four courts at once.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman thinks that is better, I have no objection to it.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman from Colorado is usually well informed in respect to these matters.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It occurred to me that under the language suggested by the gentleman from California you might prevent a change of venue and give some courts exclusive jurisdiction.

Mr. RAKER. No; this is stronger than that. This is to enforce through appropriate proceedings in any court of competent jurisdiction. He commences his proceedings there, and of course you could move the transfer.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think "any court" would be better.

Mr. RAKER. Then I move to strike out the letter "s" in the word "courts," in line 3, page 39, and to insert before the word "courts" the word "any."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 39, line 3, strike out the letter "s" at the end of the word "courts" and, before the word "courts," insert the word "any."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman begins, will he yield to me?

Mr. RAKER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CRAMTON. In line with the amendment which we have just adopted, does not the gentleman think we should make that read "an appropriate proceeding" in place of "appropriate proceedings"?

Mr. RAKER. No; I think it is right the way it is. Appropriate proceedings may be an action in ejectment; it may be an action to forfeit a lease; it may be an action to compel them to carry out their contract, and it allows them to take any one of these proceedings that might be appropriate in a court of competent jurisdiction—not by legislative action whereby we say by legislation that a man may commence as many actions relating to the same property, if it be in diverse territories, if the imaginary line runs through it, as he pleases; and thereby he could not raise the question that more than one action is pending upon the same subject matter. I think the gentleman's question, while pertinent, as all of his questions are, does not apply to this particular matter.

I desire to call the attention of the committee to one other thing, not with a view to striking it out, however. I am wondering whether or not we may not be a little severe:

Violations of the provisions of this section shall constitute grounds for the forfeiture of the permit or lease, to be enforced through appropriate proceedings in any court of competent jurisdiction.

In several of the bills we have permitted and directed the Secretary of the Interior to present the case to the Attorney General; the Attorney General was then to take proper proceedings to enforce the provisions of the contract and see that they are carried out and not permit a forfeiture. We ought not to pass legislation that is always holding a club over a man who is trying to do the right thing. If he permits the time limit to pass, the royalty amount, or the rental to go by—if he does many other things referred to in here, which easily can be corrected, a forfeiture is authorized.

I am not going to move to strike out the provision, but we ought to be at least careful in getting legislation of this kind that will produce results, that will protect the Government, and that means the people who own this property, and that is what it is—the Government is the proprietary owner and Congress disposes of it for the Government the same as a board of directors would for a corporation—and at the same time give the man or men, association, or corporation an opportunity to proceed without some one constantly after him to say that if he slips upon an icy street he is going to lose all his rights and have to go into court, and there will be a change of courts and different views and different thoughts. Men look at things differently; one state of facts might authorize forfeiture, and the court having passed upon the facts where there is a conflict the higher courts universally approve the lower courts' judgment; there may be no law involved; it is only a question of conflict of facts. Therefore you leave these conditions very unsatisfactory, and I believe the latter part of the bill to some extent corrects it. I know it is not the purpose of this committee to enact a piece of legislation that will be a club over the men who are trying to do a legitimate business, but the interpretation of this section should be liberal, should be fair, and if a man can comply with conditions that he has not complied with in advance, and it appears so to the court, no forfeiture, of course, should be permitted, and he should be allowed to comply with his contract where there is no destruction or damage or injury done.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to call attention to what the gentleman who has preceded me has said, because I was very much interested in his reference to the severe provisions of this section with regard to the forfeiture of the lease. Of course we all understand that the law abhors fines, forfeitures, and penalties. But we are not construing this act. The construction of it is a matter for the court. Now, if you will refer to lines 23 and 24, there is imposed upon the lessee of these oil lands a very severe and probably expensive operation, namely, that he is to "use all reasonable precaution to prevent waste of oil and gas developed in the land."

Mr. RAKER. Now, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The very purpose of my suggestion is with that idea in view. Some witnesses go into court and say you permit waste. You may find a dozen who would say that you have done all you could. If you can convince the court that you have permitted waste under this lease provision, if the court wanted to be technical and be strict in the matter following one line of witnesses' testimony, he would forfeit the lease, would he not?

Mr. ROBBINS. An action in court would forfeit the lease. Does the gentleman know what that means?

Mr. RAKER. Forfeit a lease——

Mr. ROBBINS. Just wait a minute and let me answer that. The forfeiture of this lease means you are going to have men who have gone probably from the oil regions of Pennsylvania, where they learned the business—because you are not going to get anybody to develop these leases except oil people, who have had experience in that business—and who have gone out to Montana or California for that purpose and have erected derricks, and they have hauled pipe for miles, got engines, and probably piped water for miles, and put down an oil well. They have no provisions for taking care of their oil when it comes to the surface, because it was a venture, and they did not know whether they would get oil or not, so they have simply dug a hole in the ground and banked it up and preserved the oil as best they could. It will evaporate, it will sink away, and if they have not resorted to the very best means or reasonable means, which means effective methods, they are risking a forfeiture.

Mr. RAKER. Precautions.

Mr. ROBBINS. "Or reasonable precaufions," those are the terms—why you are going to have them brought into court and the lease forfeited, when they are doing their best. Now, the people who want to forfeit these lands are probably the owners of the next property and want to oust the adjoiner and get their oil.

Mr. RAKER. That is just the point, exactly.

Mr. ROBBINS. You are going to have them surrounded by a lot of hostile witnesses and bring them in a strange court. I think the provision is too severe. Here is another provision that involves an immense amount of expense that can not be determined. To read the bill further, the lessee is not only "to use all reasonable precautions" to "prevent waste of oil or gas developed in the land," but he is to use all reasonable precautions "to prevent the entrance of water through wells drilled by him to the oil sands or oil-bearing strata, to the destruction or injury of the oil deposits." Now, if these wells are deep, as they are in the West, the lessee has not only got to pipe water to the well for operating purposes, but is compelled to shut surface water off in the water-bearing strata above the oil-bearing strata and he has got to plug that well. He has got to resort to every reasonable precaution to prevent the water from getting down into the oil-bearing strata below.

Mr. RAKER. May I ask a question right there?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Having made that statement and having experience in the oil fields in Pennsylvania, what is the remedy if the lessee fails to carry out the terms of the lease; do they forfeit it?

Mr. ROBBINS. No. In Pennsylvania we have a statute on the books, or an act of assembly, as we term it, that regulates oil operations. The well is drilled down, of course, through the various stratifications until it strikes the oil-bearing rock. The well may go through salt-water-bearing rock, fresh-water-bearing rock, and that water would naturally flow down into the oil strata, and, being heavier, drive the oil away. Now, we do not compel them to block these various stratifications or plug the well, as it is termed, to shut off the water until they abandon the well, when it ceases to pump, because the pipe that is put in the well to pump the oil through would shut it off, and we require that to be done, but we do not forfeit the lease unless there is such willful negligence, willful carelessness, intentional carelessness, and lack of diligence and care that will show that there is something more than mere failure to shut off the water, as this act of Congress provides. This act requires a guaranty that no water will be permitted to flow down into the well, which is unreasonable.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania have one minute more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Take those provisions in lines 21, 22, 23, and 24, on page 38, and the party does not do those things. Can you suggest a better remedy than the forfeiture provision found at the last of this section? If you have a better remedy, what is the suggestion? I would like to hear it, because I think it is interesting and important.

Mr. ROBBINS. We never have a forfeiture clause in either our Pennsylvania law or any oil leases for failure to shut off water. We treat that as a failure to be punished not by a forfeiture but as a crime to be punished by a fine and imprisonment. We do not treat it as a forfeiture of the lease, because if you are going to forfeit the lease the penalty is too severe. You are going to deter bona fide operators from going into your oil fields to develop them at great expense; if you are going to hold up before them the fact that if they fail to "shut off the water" or "take reasonable care of the oil," and that these facts can be established by witnesses located on and interested in claims around them that may be and will probably be hostile, because they want to grab the lease, or jump the claim, then you deter and drive away the oil prospector; in other words, they will not undertake the expenditure required to develop the oil on the public domain under such harsh conditions.

Mr. RAKER. Your experience has been that this question could be best reached by an appropriate remedy of that kind instead of by a forfeiture clause?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes. And I think we ought to do that.

Mr. RAKER. Do you find it is workable in Pennsylvania?

Mr. ROBBINS. We do. It works well there, and in Pennsylvania our law favors the prospector who takes all the risk, and who under our liberal and encouraging policies has developed the vast material wealth of our great Commonwealth.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that after the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that after the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close.

Mr. MONDELL. I would like five minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. I will modify my request and ask five minutes for the gentleman from Wyoming.

The CHAIRMAN. The request is made for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say this in answer to what has been said by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] and especially the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS]. There are only two things really in section 11 that would constitute grounds for forfeiture. One would be to drill a well within 200 feet of an outer boundary, and the other would be to fail to "use all reasonable precautions to prevent waste of oil or gas developed in the land or the entrance of water through wells drilled, * * * to the destruction or injury of the oil deposits."

Now, as I gather it, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] thinks a forfeiture ought not to be ordered unless it is made clearly to appear that this negligence was willful. Now, from what we heard in the hearings, it appears, at least in the California fields and elsewhere, the whole field might be affected by the negligence of one party, in one well, by letting water into the field, and if that is true it would seem that the thing the Government is concerned about is that the fact that negligence occurs, and not allow some fellow to get away because of his ignorance if, in fact, he did ruin the field or seriously depreciate it. It seems to me it will be a matter of great danger to introduce that item of intention into the legislation.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the provision beginning about line 10, after the word "act," on page 38, running down to line 19, as follows:

No wells shall be drilled within 200 feet of any of the outer boundaries of the lands embraced within any permit or lease unless the adjoining lands have theretofore been patented or the title thereto otherwise vested in private owners, or unless the lessees or patentees of such adjoining lands shall, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, agree to the drilling of wells and removal of the oil or gas from the 200-foot tracts.

I would like to have the attention of the gentlemen of the committee as to this. The effect of the language of the bill will be this, that in case the adjoining land is patented the Government lessee can not drill on the 200-foot strip unless the patentee of the adjoining land agrees to allow him to do so. The patentee of the adjoining land can drill right up to within an inch of the Government boundary, because he owns and controls his land, but the Government operator can not drill on the 200-foot strip unless the adjoining patentee agrees to let him do so. Now, nothing of the sort was intended, I am sure; but that is clearly a fair construction of the language.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. What does the gentleman think of this language:

And no wells shall be drilled within 200 feet of any of the outer boundaries of the lands embraced within any permit or lease unless the adjoining lands have theretofore been patented or title thereto otherwise vested in private owners?

Does not that answer the gentleman's criticism?

Mr. MONDELL. It says:

Unless the lessees or patentees of such adjoining lands shall, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, agree——

Mr. CRAMTON. Another case. He does not have to get the consent if the title has previously vested in private ownership, but otherwise he has to get the consent.

Mr. MONDELL. I am inclined to think that under the language of the gentleman's bill he would have to get the consent of the private owner.

Mr. CRAMTON. Otherwise they would have said "and unless."

Mr. MONDELL. The language is not happy, because in no event should the Secretary of the Interior have to go to a private owner and enter into negotiations in regard to the drilling on the 200-foot strip.

Mr. FERRIS. We do not have to do that.

Mr. MONDELL. Of course, the Secretary of the Interior would have authority without any law to enter into negotiations as to a reasonable arrangement for the drilling of oil wells within the 200-foot strip. But the language of the act seems to carry the idea with it that in some way the owner of the adjacent land is to be consulted beforehand.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the fact that the debate has closed, I ask unanimous consent for one minute, in order to make a statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FERRIS. I think the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] quite effectively answered the gentleman from Wyoming; but if the gentleman was right in the proposition, it ought to be amended. But I am sure he is not right, after reading it again. There are three things there. One of them is, if the adjoining land is patented land, then the owner may drill clear up to the property line. That is No. 1. If the title is in any wise vested in private ownership, he may come clear up to the line; and, third, he may make a contract between the private owner and the claimant, and they may both refrain from drilling up to the line or they may drill up to the line as long as it may be economically done, and in that event it has to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior. It would be a very great injustice—and the language is not so overly clear here—to have the claimant held back from the 200-foot line and let the private owner drill up to the line and drain the Government lessee's property. This language allows no such thing to happen.

Mr. MONDELL. I think perhaps, even if the committee does not think the language needs modification, that the discussion may serve a good purpose, at least as clearly indicating the intention of the committee. I suggest that in conference it might be possible to slightly modify that language so as to make it very definite and clear.

Mr. FERRIS. I think the gentleman from Wyoming is right about that. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], sitting in his seat, was talking about that when the House convened to-day, and I read that very carefully; and on first thought I was of the opinion that it might be right, but on a rereading, as you will find on page 38, line 18, the claimant could come clear up to the property line; and, second, the title thereto might be vested in private owners, and then he could come clear to the property line; and, third, he is required to use all reasonable precautions to prevent waste of oil or gas developed in the land or the entrance of water through wells drilled by him to the oil sands or oil-bearing strata, to the destruction or injury of the oil deposits, that might be most economical and best.

Mr. CRAMTON. And that might accommodate the third lessee?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes. There might be economy in not drilling unnecessary holes and blocking off water, and other economies that ought to be observed. This language has been combed over very carefully, and I think we better leave it as it is. I appreciate the desire of Members to help us get a good bill, but amendments hurriedly agreed to on the floor are always fraught with danger.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That all unappropriated deposits of oil or gas situated within the geologic structure of a producing oil or gas field and the unentered lands containing the same, except, however, those embraced in any prospecting permit during the life of the same, may be leased by the Secretary of the Interior through competitive bidding under general regulations in areas not exceeding 640 acres and in tracts which shall not exceed in length two and one-half times their width, such leases to be conditioned upon the payment by the lessee of such royalty as may be fixed in the lease, which shall be not less than one-eighth in amount of value of the production, which royalty on demand of the Secretary of the Interior shall be paid in oil or gas, and the payment in advance of a rental of not less than $1 per acre per annum thereafter during the continuance of the lease, the rental paid for any one year to be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year. Leases shall be for a period of 20 years, with the preferential right in the lessee to renew the same for successive periods of 10 years upon such reasonable terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, unless otherwise provided by law at the time of the expiration of such periods: Provided, That any claimant who, either in person or through his predecessor in interest, entered upon any of the lands embraced within the Executive order of withdrawal dated September 27, 1909, prior to July 3, 1910, for the purpose of prospecting for oil or gas, and thereupon commenced development work thereon, and thereafter prosecuted such work to a discovery of oil or gas, shall be entitled to lease from the United States the producing oil or gas well or wells resulting from such work at a royalty of not less than one-eighth of all the oil and gas produced and saved therefrom, together with an area of land sufficient for operation thereof, but without the right to drill any other or additional wells thereon, except as may be authorized by the President, and no wells shall be drilled on lands subject to the terms of this act within 660 feet of any such leased well, without the consent of the lessee thereof: Provided further, That where the President shall determine that it is to the public interest, he may lease the remainder of any such claim to the claimant, upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe: And provided further, That all such claimants shall pay, in such manner as the President may determine, to the United States an amount equal to not less than the value when produced of one-eighth of all the oil and gas already produced and saved from such well or wells: And provided further, That no claimant whose well or wells may be involved in any suit brought by the United States or in any application for patent shall be entitled to a lease under this proviso, unless within six months after approval of this act he shall relinquish to the United States all rights claimed by him in such suit or application, unless the President shall further extend such time. No person who has been guilty of any fraud, or who had knowledge or reasonable grounds to know of any fraud, or who has not acted honestly and in good faith, shall be entitled to a lease under the provisions of this act.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, on page 40, line 14, to change the word "walls" to "wells." It is merely a typographical error.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to correct the spelling of the word indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. RAKER. On line 25, page 39, of the bill under consideration, and on page 40, down to and including line 6 on page 41, I hope or wish it were possible that the following language might be inserted in lieu of the language there found. The conditions, I guess, however, are not such, under the circumstances, as to make it possible. The new language that I suggest is found in one of the bills reported, reading as follows:

That upon relinquishment or surrender to the United States, within six months from the date of this act, by any locator or his successors in interest of his or their claim to any unpatented oil or gas lands included in an order of withdrawal, upon which oil or gas had been discovered, was being produced, or upon which drilling operations were in actual progress January 1, 1914, and the claim to which land was initiated prior to July 3, 1910, the Secretary of the Interior may, within his discretion, lease, on such reasonable terms and conditions as he may prescribe, to such locator or his successors in interest the said lands so relinquished, not exceeding, however, the maximum area of 640 acres to any one person, association, or corporation, said leases to be conditioned upon the payment by the lessee of a royalty of one-fourth of the oil or gas extracted or produced from the leased premises or the proceeds thereof, each lease to be for a period of 20 years, with the preferential right in the lessee to renew the same for succeeding periods of 10 years, upon such reasonable terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. RAKER. In a moment.

Mr. MONDELL. My inquiry applies to the situation as it now exists. This is the opportune time to answer it.

Mr. RAKER. Very well.

Mr. MONDELL. Is the suggested modification that the gentleman has just read the provision of the bill as it passed the House before or the provisions of the amendment proposed by the oil men this year?

Mr. RAKER. I do not know anything about the oil men. It is the provision found in the confidential committee print. I mean, in speaking like that, that I do not recognize any class or group or individuals in presenting the matter. We discuss it when it comes before the committee, and when a matter is presented and it seems just and proper it is considered carefully.

Mr. MONDELL. None of us are respecter of persons; but, of course, we have to give some definition in order to identify it.

Mr. RAKER. I think, then, the gentleman has designated it correctly. In fact, this is the provision around which all this time and work and trouble has been going on for the last six years. The rest of the bill has been so adjusted in regard to the Alaskan situation, and in regard to the repealing clause, and in regard to the general leasing provision that only this part remains at issue. In fact, every time the committee has gone over this bill they have to a greater or less extent improved and made the bill more workable, I believe, for the general development of both coal and oil and phosphate.

But this provision is one that concerns the real center of the fight. Now, there is a provision here that gives some relief. The other provision would recognize in some fields the valid claims, bona fide claims, claims where there is no semblance of fraud, claims where the parties have actually complied with the law and discovered oil, but reservations are placed over them. But I am so optimistic in the affairs here and have such a high regard for the general justness and fairness of men dealing with others, that when this gets into conference I hope it may be adjusted. There is now a difference between the House and the Senate. The House has passed heretofore one provision; the Senate has passed another. I hope when this matter is finally adjusted it will be found satisfactory. The Navy Department has within the past month realized and now sees the wisdom of legislation in regard to the oil situation. The justness of its actual use at the present time is recognized, the absolute necessity of that use. There is to be no injury or damage done to any part or branch of the Navy. The conditions being such as they are, when the three departments, with the Senate and House and the conferees from these two bodies, get together, I am thoroughly convinced now that we are going to finally secure this general leasing legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER. I want four minutes more. I may not use but one. Then I shall be through.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for four minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. I am confident that this contested matter, or the matter on which there has been so much difference, will be adjusted, because all those heretofore who have been contesting the leasing system, who have, in other words, stood for an out and out patent for all lands relating to oil, coal, phosphate, sodium, and potassium, now recognize that it is a proper thing, and that the people demand the leasing bill. That whole idea and thought is consolidated in the leasing proposition, and on it they have all been working, those originally in favor, those who had some doubt, and those who were opposed to perfecting the leasing legislation; so that I believe that has been done in this bill which will thoroughly protect the Government and give the highest development, and at the same time protect the public that will have to use these various minerals in their various walks of life and in their daily occupations and vocations. So that the only thing remaining is the question of adjusting these various claims and these various controversies in California and Wyoming.

So that the only thing remaining is the question of these various controversies in California and Wyoming, and the department now realizes the necessity of opening up reserve No. 2. We do not want to open up reserve No. 1. It ought not to be opened up. No one asks to open up reserve No. 3. They have got billions of barrels of oil, but it is necessary to open up the only one which will not permit the Southern Pacific Railway Co., the Standard Oil Co., and other companies to tap all the oil in that land while we are trying to hold it for the Navy, but will permit the men to use it and develop it and obtain the oil, paying the Government the royalty that it ought to have, and at the same time treating them as they ought to be treated, because of their energy, endurance, and patriotism, because of the money that they have invested in this, and their willingness to do the right thing. There is general good feeling prevailing, and I believe we are going to get results, and that this bill will be passed as it ought to be passed.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is discussing most intelligently the provisions of this bill with reference to certain oil lands in his own State.

Mr. RAKER. I am trying to do that.

Mr. WALSH. When this measure was introduced or about to be introduced earlier in the session a great many of the Members of the House received communications and circulars in the nature of protests against this measure, which may or may not have appealed to some of the Members of the House who know very little about the intricacies and technicalities of this class of legislation, and which contended that this proposed legislation would result in the interests—I think that was the term used—which probably may have comprehended the corporations, which the gentleman has mentioned, being given a preference or unfair advantage in acquiring the rights in this oil, to the detriment of the public interest. I would like to ask——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes more in order that I may complete this somewhat complex interrogatory.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from California be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to ask the gentleman if this legislation is so framed as to safeguard the interest of the Government and of individuals who might desire to enter into oil activities, and so as not to give any preference or monopolistic advantages to large corporations or combinations of capital that might seek to acquire exclusive control in this line of activities?

Mr. RAKER. I want to say to the gentleman in answer to his very clear although somewhat prolonged question, properly put and well put, that the bill as it is now presented to the House most strenuously protects the Government in every regard, desired by those who are seeking remedial legislation; but many of us believe that it not only does that, but that it does take from the bona fide claimants who have expended their time and their money and complied with the placer-mining laws made applicable by the law to petroleum—that it takes from them from one to two thirds of what they would legitimately be entitled to.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to thank the gentleman from Massachusetts for the clear and simple question that he has asked, and the gentleman from California for the very lucid statement he has made. We all understand it now. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts and myself compliment and thank the gentleman from Illinois for his gracious remarks. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of calling attention to the modification of this section as compared with the same section of the bill as it passed the House on a former occasion. The provisions ought to be in parallel columns. The bill that passed the House with full approval of the House on two former occasions contained this language:

That upon relinquishment or surrender to the United States, within six months from the date of this act, by any locator or his successors in interest of his or their claim to any unpatented oil or gas lands included in an order of withdrawal, upon which oil or gas had been discovered, was being produced, or upon which drilling operations were in actual progress January 1, 1914, and the claim to which land was initiated prior to July 3, 1910, the Secretary of the Interior may, within his discretion, lease, on such reasonable terms and conditions as he may prescribe, to such locator or his successor in interest, the said lands so relinquished, not exceeding, however, the maximum area of 640 acres to any one person, association, or corporation, said leases to be conditioned upon the payment by the lessee of a royalty of not less than one-eighth of the oil or gas extracted or produced from the leased premises or the proceeds thereof, each lease to be for a period of 20 years.

It is a rather unusual thing for a committee, after having reported a bill unanimously and after having secured its passage through the House unanimously, to change the provisions of the bill vitally, fundamentally, and in a revolutionary manner. Therefore I thought some one ought to call attention to the fact that it has been done.

Mr. MADDEN. This is a period of revolution.

Mr. MONDELL. We were assured, when this bill was before the Committee of the Whole the last time, that it had the approval of all the secretaries whose names are in the Congressional Directory, as I recall it, and of about everybody from the President down, and that all these provisions were entirely satisfactory to everybody except a very few of us who constituted an objecting minority. That having been accomplished, the committee now come in with an entirely new provision, very different in character, which also we are assured has the approval of all of the Secretaries who have been consulted, and, I assume, of the Chief Executive, the approval of practically everybody it seems, except those who are really interested in the matter and whose rights are in jeopardy.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. I simply want to say to the gentleman that I am glad we are all "insured" under the terms of the bill. But I want to know what section of the bill he is objecting to.

Mr. MONDELL. No particular section of the bill. [Laughter.] At this time I am submitting a few remarks on the twelfth section of the bill, and calling attention to the very marked change that has come over the views of the committee since the bill was last unanimously reported, approved, and passed the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask, Mr. Chairman, for five minutes more.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that at the expiration of 10 minutes, 5 of which shall be used by the gentleman from Wyoming and 5 by myself, that all debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed.

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I wish that the gentleman from Wyoming in the course of his five minutes would give to us an illustration of the fundamental difference between the bill he is talking about and the one before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, on a further examination of the RECORD I find that the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] was not entirely accurate in answer to my inquiry a moment ago as to the genesis of the provision he was reading. It seems he was not reading the amendment offered by the oil men, but that amendment as it had at one time been approved by the committee tentatively. So that there are really three propositions, one unanimously agreed upon on a former occasion, another proposed by the oil men, modified by the committee tentatively, and the third the provision in the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Are the oil men making up this bill?

Mr. MONDELL. The oil men have not made up the bill. The trouble is the reasonable requests of the oil men have not been properly met in the bill.

I think it is entirely proper that American citizens, having great interests at stake, should be allowed to present their views to the committee, and my regret is that the committee did not see its way clear to deal as fairly with them in this particular matter as they did on a former occasion. The former provision of the bill was not a liberal one—far from it. The present one is a tremendously illiberal one and, in my opinion, not justified from anybody's standpoint.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman illustrate the difference?

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will give me time. Because of the fact that it does not do justice to the oil men in the first place, and would restrict the production of oil in the second place unless the President comes forward and agrees that additional wells may be drilled. I realize the embarrassment of the committee in view of the very great differences of opinion surrounding these matters. They formerly gave these people, who had become involved in certain withdrawals, the right to secure leases on not to exceed 640 acres on a royalty of one-eighth. In many cases they had spent hundreds of thousands of dollars on them. The provision before us allows these same men to continue to draw oil only from the wells now drilled, and to drill no further wells. The result of that will be to limit production at a time when we need to increase it.

There is a provision under which the President may allow additional wells to be drilled, and it is in the hope that the matter may be so presented to the President that he may be able to untangle this raveled skein of views, opinions, and interests, and out of it to secure something reasonably fair, that the committee, as I understand it, has brought in the provision now contained in the bill.

No one is going to offer an amendment to it, although no one believes it is just what ought to be done.

Mr. MADDEN. Does it not put a good deal of a burden on the President to unravel these troublesome problems?

Mr. MONDELL. It does.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON].

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I made some preliminary remarks in general debate the other day in regard to the attitude of the western members of the committee touching this bill, and I had particular reference at that time to the provisions of this section. This section gives the California oil operators and the Wyoming oil operators, who were caught out in the first withdrawals, concerning the validity of which there was a great deal of doubt among lawyers and judges—it gives to these men who were brought into that unfortunate situation, not by their own fault, not by any conspiracy, practically nothing but a modicum of the very meager relief which this House has heretofore given to them unanimously. Twice this House has passed a bill without any opposition granting to these men upon the relinquishment of all of their claims to the Government a lease of their claims, not exceeding a limit of 640 acres, upon a royalty of one-eighth, namely, the ordinary commercial royalty which obtains between lessor and lessee in ordinary commercial oil-lease transactions.

Under the relief provisions heretofore accepted by the House the Government got the advantage of the great expenditures of time and money made by the pioneer oil men of the West and obtained the same rental that it would receive from an ordinary lessee. That was rather unfair. It was the relinquishment by the oil operator of all benefits of his pioneering efforts. Now he is brought down by a combination of circumstances, by the pressure of the departments, to relief which is far below the meager relief offered to him twice before.

I want to express one hope, and that is that there may be some way to get the President's mind personally on this proposition, to get his personal attention to the real merits, in order that under the discretion granted to him in this bill he may do justice to the oil men of the West. Then, I know he will do proper justice to the oil men of California and Wyoming, just as they have met him—patriotically and generously. [Applause.]

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I shall detain the committee only a moment or two upon this, but the committee is entitled to know something about this. This is the so-called relief section over which there has been so very much controversy. This is the section about which Congress was circularized early in the present session. It is the same section referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], and by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and this is the section that the Secretary of the Navy formerly objected to—rather, it is the subject matter of the section. The section has changed so much no one would know it.

Mr. MADDEN. This is the section that the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] so lucidly described a few moments ago?

Mr. FERRIS. This is the same one, and this is the same subject matter that the Department of Justice has been interested in and about which it has written so many letters to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, Mr. WEBB. It is the same section that the Secretary of the Navy has written so many letters about to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, Mr. PADGETT. It is the same section over which there is still a sharp controversy between the Senate and the House. This is the section that the oil men now claim is harsh, and that it deals heavily with them. So much for the identity of this section. Let me in a word state how we arrived at this section. There are three naval reserves in the West, large in area and with a good deal of oil in them, some of them very rich in oil, some partially developed, some totally, and some not at all. They were withdrawn in 1909 by President Taft. Drilling was in progress at that time. Men had vested rights there then. This withdrawal order stopped the whole performance. There were horseback opinions given hither and thither throughout the West that this withdrawal order had no effect, and that President Taft had no authority to do what he did do.

Many good, honest men went on drilling under the advice of highly paid counsel, who thought they knew their business, and they thought that was the law. Finally, after six or seven years the Supreme Court held that he had the authority to withdraw the land, and it was a divided court at that. The Attorney General has heretofore brought 55 suits in an effort to have the court hold they had no rights at all, trying to take all of their property away from them. With the eye of a prosecutor who is relentless and pitiless, I suppose the Department of Justice was doing its full duty. The Secretary of the Navy, with an eye vigilant to the withholding of all Government property and preserving an adequate supply of oil for the Navy, also had the oil men by the throat, and the Secretary of the Interior, who is the legal custodian and executive officer of this land, was somewhat of a sharpshooter in looking after the Government's interests. He, too, was vigilant, clear-headed, and watchful that no Government rights be sacrificed or neglected.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, as the bill passed the Senate the oil men felt that they had fared pretty well. They did. The Navy Department was protesting with all the steam they had at their command, and the Department of Justice with all the steam they had. The Secretary of the Interior agreed to but a part of the provisions that went into the bill. The bill came over here and was referred to the Committee on Public Lands. Our committee set to work to have hearings in an effort to thrash out the differences and try to get at some plan whereby we could do justice to these oil men—and they are good honorable men, every one of them, and nothing but the most honorable tactics have been maintained by them throughout the whole proceeding.

We had hearings lasting five or six weeks. We called to our aid a representative of the Department of Justice, which had started the 55 suits, and their representative sat there through every part of the six weeks' hearing. We called to our aid the Secretary of the Navy, and he designated Commander Wright, one of his representatives, who sat there and observed everything we did and said. Secretary Lane furnished us Judge Finney, one of his law officers, to come and help us. They were all helpful. They were all anxious to do their duty. Our committee was patient and earnest. It was a hard job; it was a difficult job. We labored as faithfully as we knew how, and every man on the committee, on both sides, was patriotically and honestly trying to do the right thing; trying not to rob these men, who had honestly spent hundreds of thousands of dollars to develop that desert waste; trying not to take the last penny they had. No one wanted to do that. On the other hand, we did not feel that we ought to surrender to the oil men and let them have all of their amendments. They had 25 or 30 amendments which they wanted inserted. I do not criticize them for that. It is natural. Human nature is very much the same everywhere. It is the same in my State; it is the same in Wyoming; it is the same in California. The ordinary citizen feels that anything that he can divest his Government of and give to himself with color of honor he ought to do it. I do not want to render any wholesale indictment against people, but human nature is just the same everywhere. We sat there for six weeks. The oil men came and laid their cards on the table. They offered 25 or 30 amendments. I had their amendments printed in italics in the bill as a special committee print, so that everyone could see what they were. Some of the amendments we adopted and some of the amendments are in the bill, and made it better than it was before. With such intelligence and light as we had before us we accepted them, but on this question of relief we did not accept their proposal. Their proposal, as advocated in before the Senate and elsewhere, was, in a word, to direct the dismissal of the 55 suits. I do not think a legislative body ought to do any such thing now or to-morrow or at any time. It is taking too much responsibility. Their plan was to direct the issuance of patents to these lands.

Mr. ELSTON. Is the gentleman not speaking of a situation of about five years ago? They have not within recent years tried to do anything such as the gentleman suggests, have they? The oil men of California and Wyoming did not ask to have the suits dismissed?

Mr. FERRIS. The Senate bill amounts to that.

Mr. ELSTON. I mean in the House.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not know whether they instigated that in the Senate. This matter has been before us so long—it has appeared in so many forms. I hold in my hand the Senate bill. It directs the suit to be dismissed, and it directs that patents issue for these lands. I shall not as a member of the committee ever do any such thing as that. Congress ought not to do any such thing. It is too much to expect of us.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has again expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not want to bore the House, but this is a very important matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Oklahoma be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, how long is the gentleman going to continue?

Mr. FERRIS. Five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask that I may have three minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I will quit now because the gentleman has spoken twice, I think, and I do not think the gentleman ought to do that. I have charge of the bill and I have not consumed a great deal of the time, and the gentleman has consumed a tremendous lot of time.

Mr. MONDELL. This is a very important section of the bill and there are two sides to this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection has been made, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask five minutes, I have not talked at all on this bill. I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object—and I am not going to object—the gentleman understands that this is a sort of aftermath discussion. There is an amicable arrangement in reference to this whole situation that has been effected. There is no soreness on the part of California. I said yesterday we suffered this situation. We feel that we have not been given justice, but we feel that production is a big thing, and there have been some expressions here that provoked the explanation of the chairman. I am sure he does not intend to bring about any discussion, and surely he is not going to yield to any proposed amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it seems to me that discussion and debate upon this measure has reached a very peculiar stage when the chairman of the committee having charge of a measure can not by unanimous consent get his time extended five minutes further. I trust at least the gentleman from Illinois may have that courtesy accorded to him.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand objection was made to the request that the chairman of the committee may proceed for five minutes? I ask that my request be again submitted that the gentleman from Oklahoma may continue for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a request now pending that the gentleman from Illinois proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, did not the Chair announce that the request for extension of time to be granted to the gentleman from Oklahoma was objected to?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so did.

Mr. STAFFORD. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I inquire who objected to that request?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma himself objected to it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I again make the request, with the consent of the gentleman from Illinois, that the gentleman from Oklahoma may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. That request will be considered after the request now pending shall be decided.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws his request temporarily.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin requests that the gentleman from Oklahoma be allowed to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I may not take all of the five minutes. I thank the committee. I never have but one object in going at a thing, and that is as it is, and that is what I am trying to do here. I attach no wrong thought to those people. I said at the start they were pleading their own case. They have a right to do that, and I do not complain. They were before our committee for six weeks. They were well qualified to present their cause. Some of them have lost lots of money; some of them have made lots of money. There are, I suppose, good and bad ones among them, but as far as I know they are a fine lot of people who have been before the committee for a long time, and we gladly and patiently heard them. What I am trying to get at, and if the words I speak now have any force at all it will be a little help to me in conference to hold this matter in line. I try never to speak without purpose, and I have a purpose in this, and that is I want the House to know a little about this so that I might perchance get a little support in conference. The trouble about this bill is not here to-day, it is in conference. This provision as it now stands, as has been suggested by the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON] has been agreed to. It enjoys the indorsement of the three departments that have to do with it—Secretary Lane, Secretary Daniels, and Attorney General Gregory.

Attorney General Gregory has the suits, Secretary Daniels has the Naval Reserves, and Secretary Lane, has the administration of the lands. They have all written letters and advocated and helped to make this section. They were present by their representatives at all times. Our committee has finally agreed and the Members of the Western States have agreed. Those Members representing the States of these oil constituents who are in the oil business think this is but scant justice. Perhaps it may be, but we can not get together on any other provision than this, and we have tried as long as there is any use in trying to get together on anything else. This provision is, in a word, that a claimant can go ahead and drill wells, work, and pump oil from the wells now open and producing, but does not let them go on drilling more on these naval reserves. If they want to go and bore more wells they must make a new lease. They can not go on their old claim to titles.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. That does not apply only to naval reserves, it applies to any of the lands affected?

Mr. FERRIS. I understand, but there is a provision—there was some controversy whether they have titles out there or not—there was a provision here if in the judgment of the President—which of course does not mean very much, it only means a departmental officer who has to do with that particular branch will recommend to him—he may by proclamation when public interests demand the need of oil, permit drilling everywhere, inside and outside.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman alarms me a little there. In the event it is developed that the country comes to face a very serious situation, due to the shortage of oil during this war crisis and these preserves present one of the best opportunities for a quick increase of consumption, does not the gentleman feel that that clause would then be of importance?

Mr. FERRIS. I do. What I meant to say was I do not think this confers such unusual and extended powers on the President, but it really means that the administrative officer under him who has jurisdiction of that particular branch will work out the details and the President will affix his signature to it. I can not believe that the President can have the time to blow the nose of every citizen in the Republic every time the occasion may warrant it. I know he is the greatest man in the world to-day. I know his ability to turn off work is almost limitless, still he should not be expected to deal with all these oil claimants and the limitless muddles they get into.

Mr. RAKER. As a matter of fact, naval reserves Nos. 1 and 3, there is no one desiring to take that and go ahead?

Mr. FERRIS. That is true, but the Navy reserve No. 2 is the big oil reserve, and Navy No. 2 is where the big strike and the big wells are. It is the one where the big oil wells are. It is the one over which their has been so much controversy.

Mr. ELSTON. Is it not a fact that seven-eighths of the land comprised in Navy reserve No. 2 is private property, either by patent or adjudication of the courts up to date, and the Navy has admittedly, so far as uncontested title is concerned, or possibly where the title may be contested and where the opinion is it may prevail, title to about only one-eighth of it, and that seven-eighths is in private hands?

Mr. FERRIS. That is, provided the Southern Pacific is going to win the suit. That is not yet the final judgment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am going to confess what I very rarely confess, to a very scant knowledge of the legislation that is pending. As a rule, I try to be familiar with the details of legislation before the House, but I know very little, if anything, about this bill.

But I am very glad the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], the chairman of this committee, brought out the fact that it was proposed to legislate lawsuits out of court by the men who were interested in making up this section of the bill, and that the committee decided not to allow that to be done, for I know of nothing that would be more vicious than legislation that would take out of court cases that are in process of adjudication. I have seen things of that sort attempted here before. Fortunately, the membership of the House, when they understand the situation, have always used wisdom in the determination of the question.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There never was anyone who asked for any such right as that, and the provision that was put in was to give them, in case they chose to relinquish any suit they had, the right to come in under the bill; but neither the committee nor the oil men themselves have ever asked that anybody's judicial rights should be taken away. We could not do it if we desired to do so.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood the gentleman from Oklahoma to say that the language of the bill originally would legislate cases out of court.

Mr. ELSTON. I take exception to the accuracy of the chairman's statement on that.

Mr. FERRIS. The Senate bill.

Mr. MADDEN. I did not intend to say that it was done in this committee, but somebody wrote it in. The legislation was before us. This committee struck it out. At whose instance it was put in I do not know and do not care. I think it is vicious, and I am glad, more than glad, that the men on the Committee on the Public Lands of the House have had wisdom enough, and patriotism enough, and integrity enough to stand against that kind of vicious legislation. If these men who have made claims on oil property out in the West have any rights and those rights are contested by the Government of the United States, let the courts decide who is entitled to them. We have no right to take those cases out of court, and ought not to do it. It would be dishonest if we should do it, and it would be proper that we should be criticized for not having the integrity of purpose that should exist in Congress. I do not care who the oil men are, how much influence they have, how much patriotism they profess, how much they are giving up, how far they are willing to concede the rights of others, I am opposed to them or anybody else being permitted to write language into any bill that would legislate a case out of court. If this bill, when it came to the Committee on the Public Lands of the House, contained any such provision as this I am proud of the integrity of our Committee on the Public Lands for taking it out of the bill, and I hope that when the bill goes to conference the conferees of the committee will be sustained by the House in their determination not to insert it in the bill again. For one, I will be found here on the floor, if I am alive, defending them in any report that will insist on maintaining the integrity of the Government and protecting the rights of the American people against any combination of interests, I do not care whether they are in the oil business or any other business.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That rights of way through the public lands of the United States are hereby granted for pipe-line purposes for the transportation of oil or natural gas to any applicant possessing the qualifications provided in section 1 of this act to the extent of the ground occupied by the said pipe line and 25 feet on each side of the same under such regulations as to survey, location, application, and use as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and upon the express condition that such pipe lines shall be constructed, operated, and maintained as common carriers: Provided, That no right of way shall hereafter be granted over the public lands for the transportation of oil or natural gas except under and subject to the provisions, limitations, and conditions of this section. Failure to comply with the provisions of this section or the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior shall be ground for forfeiture of the grant by the United States district court for the district in which the property, or some part thereof, is located in an appropriate proceeding.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California, a member of the committee, offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 42, lines 1 and 2, strike out the words "or the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California desire to be heard?

Mr. RAKER. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to be recognized in opposition to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am inclined to protest against our slipping through here, without a word of explanation, a provision that takes it entirely out of the hands of the Secretary of the Interior to enforce the regulations that we empower him to make.

Now, we are proposing to lease properties that are worth, perhaps, millions. We are placing it in the hands of the Interior Department to make the regulations under which those leases shall be held, and then the committee, after consideration, having provided that upon a violation of those regulations a lease may be forfeited by a proceeding in court, now it is proposed by a member of the committee, without a word of explanation or any discussion whatever, to strike out a provision for enforcement as to the regulations of the Interior Department. And personally I can not refrain from making an objection to the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I am going to take five minutes when I get the chance, now.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am delighted if I have at least been able to get the sponsor of the amendment to say something. It is customary to get the proponents of an amendment to open a discussion, but in this I was mighty lucky to get it at all.

Mr. RAKER. I thought I would save time of the committee. It is so apparent and so just that possibly I made a mistake in not explaining it. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that other provisions of the bill authorize the Secretary of the Interior to prescribe rules and regulations that go into the laws. Now, do not forget that. I want to particularly call that to the attention of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

Now, this provision is entirely different and distinct. The provisions in section 13 are those prescribed in the law, and, whether they are included in the lease or not, they are a part of the lease, and if the lessee violates those provisions of the law the lease may be forfeited in a court of competent jurisdiction under proper proceeding.

Now, when we reach the proviso that is offered to be stricken out, we find that the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to prescribe regulations not in the lease, not contained in the lease, not known to the lessee, not known to the public nor in the law, no one having knowledge of them, enacted after the lease has been enforced possibly for a year or two years—things that might deprive the lessee of his valuable property. The Secretary of the Interior prescribes regulations whereby, if the lessee does not comply with them, what is to happen? Not that they should be enforced, but that the lessee loses his lease. You can go into a court of competent jurisdiction and forfeit the lease under a rule and regulation adopted by the Secretary of the Interior years after the lease has been issued and the party has been in possession of the property.

Now, clearly, there is not any legislator nor any man who wants to take a snap judgment upon anybody by adopting rules and regulations that will forfeit the property under the rules and regulations that he can carry out. If he does not do it you can go into court and compel him to carry them out. Oh, no. You are not satisfied with that. You want to forfeit his property. You want to take it from him with the high hand without his knowledge.

Now, clearly, neither this Congress nor any Congress ought to pass such a law as to leave a snare and a pit for a man to fall into. You want to be open and fair. You want to deal with them with open-handedness and give them an opportunity to have written into the law what you expect them to do. And if you write into the law provisions to be complied with, everybody will know; they will know when they get their lease and start to work. If they do not comply with it and are recalcitrant they go into court and forfeit it.

Mr. CRAMTON rose.

Mr. RAKER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CRAMTON. No. I am in hopes to give the gentleman some information. I wait for the gentleman to conclude.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman spoke about giving information. I am always willing to get information.

That being the case, Mr. Chairman, I am sure we ought not to put any snares or pitfalls into this bill. We allow the Secretary of the Interior to make rules and regulations if they are inserted in the lease. That is all right, because if a man takes a lease he takes it knowing those facts. They are written in the lease. But even my able and distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] does not want rules and regulations to be issued that will forfeit a man's lease or property after the lease has been executed and delivered, does he?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. FERRIS. Reserving the right to object, after the gentleman concludes, in five minutes, I ask unanimous consent that the general debate be concluded. No; I modify, Mr. Chairman, that by including five minutes for the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], making it 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the debate on this section be concluded in 10 minutes, giving 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, if I properly understood the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], who is generally very clear, I understood him to fear that, by reason of the phrase which he tries to strike out, the lease under which these operators would secure their oil might be forfeited by reason of these regulations.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the gentleman who has proposed this amendment. I understand the gentleman is worrying because the lease that the oil operator has is going to be forfeited in some way because of some regulations that are not in the lease. That is the idea, is it?

Mr. RAKER. I will answer the question. I am not afraid, but I do not want to be a participant in——

Mr. CRAMTON. Answer the question. It is the lease that the oil operator has?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Then this, Mr. Chairman, is a good illustration of the danger in passing offhand a half-baked amendment that comes in here, even from the distinguished Member from California, because section 13 has nothing to do with oil leases whatsoever. It only has to do with rights of way through public lands to be granted for pipe line purposes for transportation of oil, under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior and upon condition that such pipe lines shall be constructed as common carriers.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DEWALT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 2812) to promote and encourage the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DENT, by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the bill (H. R. 12281) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, which, with the accompanying report (No. 607), was ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California reserves all points of order on the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs when he expects to call up the bill?

Mr. DENT. The understanding was that the bill would be called up on Monday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Alabama, for his information, that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, introduced his deficiency bill this morning and announced that he would like to get it up on Monday. The Chair makes that suggestion to the gentleman.

Mr. DENT. Then there is evidently some misunderstanding.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from Kentucky can work this out in the meantime.

EXPLORATION FOR COAL, PHOSPHATE, OIL, GAS, AND SODIUM.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 2812) to promote the mining of coal, and so forth.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. DEWALT in the chair.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, this section does not refer to oil leases but to the grants of rights of way for pipe-line purposes, and it provides that they shall be "granted for pipe-line purposes for the transportation of oil or natural gas to any applicant possessing the qualifications provided in section 1 of this act"; that such grants shall be subject to "such regulations as to survey, location, application, and use as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior," and that "failure to comply with the provisions of this section or the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior shall be ground for forfeiture of the grant by the United States district court," and so forth.

I submit that the point of the gentleman's argument which refers to provisions of oil leases does not apply to this section and the amendment ought not to be adopted. It is an example of the peril of accepting an amendment on the mere suggestion of a Member and without consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 41, line 16, after the word "and," strike out "twenty-five on each side of the same," and insert in lieu thereof the words "not exceeding an additional 10 feet parallel with same."

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I see no reason for granting a right of way for a pipe-line company of this magnitude. There is no reason in the world why a pipe line should have any more right of way than a railroad company, and most of the railroads in this country only have 50 feet right of way. This bill provides that the pipe lines shall have a grant of the land occupied by the pipe line and then an additional 25 feet on each side of the pipe line.

Now, this is entirely too much ground to give to any pipe-line company. As everybody knows, most of the railroads of the United States have only 50 feet of right of way—they have to make grades, and so forth—but a pipe line only takes up 12 or 16 inches, making no grade, simply digs ditches, goes over the hills and down again, and the Government ought not to give a pipe-line company this amount of land.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have not as much knowledge of oil pipe lines as the gentleman from Oklahoma, who lives in an oil district, but I have seen pipe lines in the West, and the query arose whether it is necessary to grant such a large right of way as 20 feet. I can not see any necessity of having that space granted to one separate company. I should think with the pipe line laid in a gulch it would be advantageous to have the pipe line confined to a narrow way. Everyone agrees that 50 feet is too extensive, but why should you give 20 feet to one company? Might not that be too large a width to be granted to a company?

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield? Do I understand the gentleman to say that anybody has admitted that the width permitted in the bill is too much?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have heard expressions from gentlemen on the committee that 50 feet was entirely too much.

Mr. MONDELL. Have gentlemen changed their minds since they left the committee room? I thought we were bound to stand by the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman can see how they have stood by the bill in voting down an amendment by the gentleman from California which seemingly had the support of some members of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

There was no objection.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman's query, my amendment does not provide for 20 feet but for 10 feet in addition to what they occupy. Really I do not see a great deal of use for an additional 10 feet, although the question might arise in building telegraph and telephone lines parallel to the pipe line, and that is a part of the pipe line for which they might need the additional 10 feet. Most of the pipe lines over private ground simply provide for land that is occupied by the pipe line and the right of ingress and egress to repair the pipe lines. I can see no reason why a pipe-line company should be granted an additional right of way over public land from what they would ask over private land. That is my reason for offering this amendment and to give them 10 additional feet from what they ask from private individuals.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I infer that my good friend from Oklahoma has never lived in a mountainous country. In a mountainous or rough and broken or hilly country pipe lines are sometimes buried on side hills or gulches, sometimes on high trestles, and on all kinds of ground, and people have to go up and down the lines to mend breaks in and repair the pipe line, and for various reasons, and you can not drive teams or haul material on a 10-foot strip of ground through that kind of country. The use of it is merely an easement, subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior. These regulations will not prevent the ground from being used, if the ground is such that it ever can be used for anything; that is, if a pipe line runs over any land that anybody ever wants. It is only public land that has been heretofore deemed worthless. If the lands over which a pipe line will run were any good they would be in private ownership long ago. It is only the rough, arid land that nobody wants which is now open for settlement. If merely an easement over a right of way is given, and only temporarily, for the occupation by a pipe line, subject to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior will prescribe, the Government is not going to be hurt any by allowing the owner to use for that purpose only a strip of ground 25 feet wide on each side of the center of the pipe line, and I hope the gentleman's amendment will be defeated.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. We have pipe lines going over hills where you could not think of leading a horse, let alone driving a wagon. So what good would 50 feet be? Your 10 feet covers it, and the ground used for the pipe line is taken up, and all you need is the right of ingress and egress as you get over private land. They have got to get to that in some way.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I did not yield to the gentleman to make an argument. The gentleman has already made a 10-minute speech in support of his amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. The gentleman asked me a question.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman says that railroad rights of way are 50 feet. As a matter of fact, railroad rights of way are, I think, always at least 200 feet, and some railroads have a right of way of 400 feet.

Mr. MONDELL. The Union Pacific Railway right of way is 400 feet.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; I know that road claims 400 feet for about 1,000 miles. All of our railroads in the mountainous West must have 100 feet right of way. Our wagon roads are 60 feet, and even a ditch through that country ordinarily has a right of way of 25 feet on each side. They have to have it in order to properly maintain the ditch. This right-of-way provision pertains principally to Colorado and Wyoming and we now have a Federal law on this subject expressly applying to those two States and allowing a 50-foot strip of land for a pipe line.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended five minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. Reserving the right to object, which of course I do not intend to do, I ask unanimous consent that at the expiration of five minutes debate be closed. The amendment is a very inconsequential one.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will remember, I did not use the last five minutes he got for me.

Mr. FERRIS. Then I ask that at the expiration of 10 minutes, 5 minutes to go to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] and 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming, debate on this may be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that at the expiration of 10 minutes, of which 5 minutes shall go to the gentleman from Colorado and 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming, debate on this amendment shall close. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, owing to the very great shortage of oil, the very great consumption in excess of production, I assume that every Member of this House is very much in favor of oil development. With a shortage of 60,000,000 barrels this year, every patriotic citizen should be in favor of any fair law that will encourage oil development, and if this House is in favor of oil development there is certainly no reason for handicapping it by any more restrictions than are already in this bill. I may say that there is not a western Member of this House, certainly none from the States to which this legislation will apply, who is satisfied with this bill. It is much more drastic than we feel it ought to be. It will not bring about the development that the country needs and would get under a more liberal bill. At the same time we have agreed to accept this bill as the best we can get, and for that reason have not filed a minority report.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. I find that——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield only for a question.

Mr. RAKER. It is a part of my question. Here is an act granting the right to establish pipe lines in Colorado, giving a right of way of 25 feet on each side. That is the law now.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; that is the Colorado and Wyoming act, and expressly grants 25 feet on each side. People can neither build or maintain a pipe line on less than that width in that country. There is no use of requiring impossibilities or restricting development by utterly impracticable restrictions and limitations that neither do the Government or anyone else any good.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. The grant gives the right to the land which it is necessary to occupy for its pipe line.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. My dear sir, to build and maintain a pipe line you have got to have more than just the actual land that the pipe rests on. You have got to have a wagon road to transport the material, you have very often got to take earth and rocks from the side of the right of way, and so on. A trestle supporting a pipe line may be 50 feet wide at the foundation. There is no earthly use of preventing construction or compelling people to come back to Congress again to get a sensible law.

When the Secretary of the Interior is given the complete control of this right of way, that is sufficient; and I hope the amendment will not be adopted, because it is entirely inadvisable, absolutely impracticable, and utterly unnecessary. It can not be made to work out. Pipe-line owners would be compelled to go out and buy land adjoining every right of way or obtain from the Government an additional grant. This provision ought to be more liberal than it is. I hope this provision or this bill will not be misconstrued, because it is not intended to repeal that Colorado and Wyoming statute granting a right of way for oil pipe lines, because that act expressly gives an additional right to take whatever material may be necessary, and is a necessary, practical, and common-sense law, and I trust this act will not be held to supersede that very fair and beneficial law.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I think your bill is broad enough to cover not only the pipe line but the pumping station, and that they can go and take what land they need for the pumping station as long as they occupy it. Pumping stations are a part of the pipe line.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Why should you want to handicap these people in their very laudable and necessary efforts at oil development?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I am not attempting to handicap these people; I am attempting to give them a bill which is right from a practical oilman's standpoint.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman evidently has never had any experience in public-land States—I mean, in the Rocky Mountains—or he would know that this right of way is an absolute necessity. We have already cut it down from 100 to 50 feet. That is certainly the limit. Development will be seriously interfered with unless we have a right of way of at least 50 feet for our pipe lines across the rough portions of the public domain.

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman speaks about some one not having had experience in a public-land State, and I take it he wants the committee to infer he has had that experience, as I believe he has.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I have lived out there for nearly 50 years.

Mr. NORTON. If so, does not the gentleman know, as a matter of fact, that the width of the right of way granted to the railroads has been found by practical experience to be altogether too great in the Western States?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The 400-foot right of way granted to the Union Pacific was more than was necessary, especially on level ground for nearly a thousand miles; but in no place where there is rough ground has the 100-foot right of way been too wide or been curtailed.

Mr. NORTON. I am sure it is the consensus of opinion of the people in the Central West that the right of way of 100 feet on each side granted to the Northern Pacific and the Great Northern Railway through Minnesota, North Dakota, and Montana is altogether too wide.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. On level farm land I think that is true. I think those railroads got a large amount of good land that they did not need and had no right to; but we are not asking for any good land or any land that we do not need.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, there is now on the statute books an oil pipe-line law, applying to Wyoming and Colorado, which grants an easement of 25 feet on each side of the pipe line.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question right there?

Mr. MONDELL. This section will repeal that law, which is in many respects much more liberal than this provision is, so we are putting in this law a provision much less liberal than the present law.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question? The provision of law which the gentleman refers to is more extensive than this one, and reads as follows——

Mr. MONDELL. I know all about it.

Mr. RAKER. The right of way is the land occupied by said pipe line and 25 feet on each side of the center. Here is the provision:

Be it enacted, etc., That the right of way through the public lands of the United States situate in the State of Colorado and in the State of Wyoming outside of the boundary lines of the Yellowstone National Park is hereby granted to any pipe-line company or corporation formed for the purpose of transporting oils, crude or refined, which shall have filed or may hereafter file with the Secretary of the Interior a copy of its articles of incorporation and due proofs of its organization under the same, to the extent of the ground occupied by said pipe line and 25 feet on each side of the center of line of the same; also the right to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of said pipe line material, earth, and stone necessary for the construction of said pipe line.

Mr. MONDELL. I introduced that bill. I know something about it. If we secure the development of oil on the public lands, which we hope for under this bill, long pipe lines will have to be built, and they will have to be built over a rough country. In many cases they will have to be carried on trestles and at elevations that will require a great spread of the trestle at the base. In many cases they will have to be built along sloping hillsides and mountain sides, and the width of 50 feet is none too great. The land that these pipe lines will run over in the main are of but little value, and all that is granted is an easement for the use of the pipe lines. No one in the operation of one of these pipe lines cares to have any more land than is absolutely essential for the maintenance of the pipe lines, but unless you grant enough so that the building of the pipe line can proceed and material can be obtained for the building of the pipe line, you hamper this very great development.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. If we were building these pipe lines largely through the fair and fertile valleys of Oklahoma, where the land is worth a great deal of money, it might be proper to reduce the width of the pipe-line right of way, but this is through public lands, mainly in the mountain and intermountain States, where it is rough, and a considerable width is necessary.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I would state to the gentleman from Wyoming that a pipe line runs from Oklahoma clear to New Jersey, over the mountains of Pennsylvania, and they have no 50 feet in addition to the ground occupied by the pipe line. They simply take the territory covered by the line.

Mr. MONDELL. I doubt if the gentleman knows how wide the rights of way are. They have purchased whatever properties they needed from the private owners. This is a proposition to build pipe lines for the development of Uncle Sam's oil and transport it to people who need it. There is no use of being niggardly in the granting of an easement in the form of a right of way.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Since looking through this Colorado and Wyoming act I find this provision in it that is not in this bill——

Mr. MONDELL. It authorizes the taking of material.

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Which this bill does not, and which on two different occasions I have endeavored to have the committee adopt, but having promised the chairman not to offer amendments I did not offer it on this occasion, though that provision ought to be in the bill.

Mr. RAKER. Let me read it to the gentleman:

Also the right to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of said pipe line material, earth, and stone necessary for the construction of said pipe line.

Mr. MONDELL. I hope the gentleman will offer that amendment to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to lease to any person or corporation qualified under this act any deposits of oil shale belonging to the United States and the surface of so much of the public lands containing such deposits, or adjacent thereto, as may be required for the extraction and reduction of the leased minerals, under such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with this act, as he may prescribe; that no lease hereunder shall exceed 5,120 acres of land, to be described by the legal subdivisions of the public-land surveys, or if unsurveyed, to be surveyed by the United States, at the expense of the applicant, in accordance with the laws and regulations for the survey of public lands. Leases may be for indeterminate periods, upon such conditions as may be imposed by the Secretary of the Interior, including covenants relative to methods of mining, prevention of waste, and productive development. For the privilege of mining, extracting, and disposing of the oil or other minerals covered by a lease under this section the lessee shall pay to the United States such royalties as shall be specified in the lease and an annual rental, payable at the beginning of each year, at the rate of 50 cents per acre per annum, for the lands included in the lease, the rental paid for any one year to be credited against the royalties accruing for that year; such royalties to be subject to readjustment at the end of each 20-year period by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That for the purpose of encouraging the production of petroleum products from shales the Secretary may, in his discretion, waive the payment of any royalty and rental during the first five years of any lease: Provided, That any person having a valid location to such minerals under existing laws on January 1, 1918, shall, upon the relinquishment of such location, be entitled to a lease under the provisions of this section, for such area of the land relinquished as shall not exceed the maximum area authorized by this section to be leased to an individual or corporation: Provided, however, That no claimant who has been guilty of fraud in the location of any oil-shale bearing lands shall be entitled to any of the benefits of this section: Provided further, That not more than one lease shall be granted under this section to any one person or corporation.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on line 10, page 42, by inserting the word "lands" after the word "or."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 42, line 10, after the word "or" insert the word "lands."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, so as to make this provision conform with the first section, which limits the granting of a lease to a person or corporation or association, I move to amend by inserting the word "association," after the word "person," in line 21, on page 43.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 43, line 21, after the word "person," insert the word "association."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to continue for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to close debate at the end of that time on this section and all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma then presents the request that at the expiration of that time all debate cease. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object to either request, is it the hope of the gentleman that we may conclude this bill to-day?

Mr. FERRIS. It is my very earnest hope, Mr. Chairman; and it is very necessary, too. Our bill only has the right of way subject to the military appropriation bill and the other appropriation bills, and there is reported and will be called up on Monday both the military appropriation bill and the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, so if we are displaced and we do not conclude our bill to-day we will have to carry this bill in our pockets, the hearings in our hands, and the data in our minds all of next week and longer, so I hope we will all help to put it through to-night, if we can.

Mr. CRAMTON. And, furthermore, the bill perhaps will not go to conference for a week.

Mr. FERRIS. And the real work is to be done in conference.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I am very much in favor of the development of the oil industry of the country, as proposed by this leasing bill, and also the coal industry of the country. At different times during the past few years I have called attention to the tremendous importance of developing the lignite coal industry of the country and the possibilities of securing from lignite coal almost unlimited quantities of light oil. There are in the United States lignite coal fields bearing more than a trillion tons of coal, more than one-third of the coal deposits in the whole United States. I shall place in the RECORD, with the permission of the committee, some remarks which I made in June, 1916, on the investigations which have been made of lignite coal, and showing the possibilities of securing from those coals light oil and the basic material for the manufacture of high explosives and for the dyestuff industry. In North Dakota, South Dakota, and Montana the Geological Survey reports that there are 964,000,000,000 tons of lignite coal. In its natural state lignite coal contains from 30 to 40 per cent of water. This and other reasons inherent in the coal itself makes it not a desirable fuel unless it goes through some chemical or mechanical process which will take out this excess moisture. The Bureau of Mines for the last five or six years particularly has been making experiments and investigations on a small scale to determine the processes of briqueting lignite coal and in that connection secure the by-products and light oils from the coal. They have found so far from 2 to 4 gallons of light oil, practical to be used in any of the combustion engines just the same as gasoline, can be secured from a ton of lignite coal. That by-product will pay a considerable portion of the expense of briqueting the coal and of putting it in a form where it can be shipped from one part of the country to the other. At the present time it is of greater importance than ever that the lignite industry in the Northwest, particularly in Montana and in the Dakotas, be developed because we are now using a large part of the transportation facilities of the country to ship coal from the head of the Great Lakes into Minnesota and the Dakotas.

Last year there was shipped into North Dakota some 700,000 tons of coal and about an equal amount into South Dakota, and more than a million tons of bituminous coal into Minnesota. If the Bureau of Mines could develop a process, and the Director of the Bureau of Mines thinks they can if they are given an opportunity to make extended experiments, that would make possible the putting of that coal in a form in which it could be sold in competition with bituminous and anthracite coal, it would relieve the railroad congestion greatly.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NORTON. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Has the gentleman appealed to the Interior Department, Bureau of Mines, to take that up in its experiment stations we established some time ago? The gentleman will remember we established some experiment stations which are supposed to work out processes of making available resources of that kind in the West, and I was wondering whether they had the authority, funds, and the information to take up that work in those experiment stations.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, at different times during the past three years I have called the attention of the House to the tremendous advantages that would accrue to the Northwest in particular and to the Nation generally through a larger development of the vast lignite coal fields of the country.

On the floor of the House on June 23, 1916, I called particular attention to the valuable by-products of lignite and the practicability of securing through distillation processes an almost unlimited supply of light oils for use in internal-combustion engines and of the basic material for the manufacture of coal-tar dyes and light explosives. My remarks made at that time I shall insert in the RECORD, so that they may have the attention of present Members of the House who were not Members at that time.

The Nation's coal resources of all ranks total 3,553,637,100,000 minable tons. Of this total 1,051,290,000,000 tons, or nearly one-third, is lignite. Of this lignite 964,424,000,000 tons are located in North and South Dakota and northeastern Montana; in Texas approximately 23,000,000,000 tons; in Alaska, 7,404,300,000 tons; and relatively smaller quantities in several of the other Western and Southern States.

This lignite coal in its natural state contains 30 to 40 per cent water, and for this and other reasons inherent in the lignite itself it is not a very desirable fuel as mined. Millions of tons of bituminous and anthracite coals are shipped annually into these lignite-bearing sections—literally "carrying coals to Newcastle"—resulting in high prices for both industrial and domestic fuel, necessarily imposing a great handicap upon the industrial development of these sections, the tying up of transportation equipment much needed for other service, and in other substantial economic lost motion.

The economic problem is not a local but a national one.

In Texas there is some bituminous coal, but not more than enough to supply the railroads.

In Alaska $35,000,000 are being spent on a railroad there, and it seems probable that the development of a large part of the territory served by this railroad will depend upon the utilization of lignite.

In North Dakota, in 1917, there was mined 603,000 tons of lignite, and imported 717,000 tons of bituminous coal from Lake docks, Indiana, and Illinois.

In South Dakota, in 1917, there was mined 12,000 tons of lignite, and imported 792,000 tons of bituminous coal from the Lake docks, Kentucky, West Virginia, Iowa, Indiana, and Illinois.

Minnesota, having no coal of her own, in 1917 imported 7,203,000 tons of bituminous coal from the Lake docks, Kentucky, West Virginia, Ohio, Tennessee, Iowa, Arkansas, Indiana, and Illinois.

The above tonnage does not include the anthracite coal from Pennsylvania, the exact figures for which are not yet available. But it is conservatively estimated that one and one-half million tons of anthracite coal are annually consumed in the territory which is naturally tributary to these Dakota lignite fields.

The exact mileage figures involved in this practically transcontinental shipment of this fuel are not available, but the mere statement of the tonnages and the distances shows that they are exceedingly large, and that the economic waste necessarily involved is little short of criminal.

The Fuel Administration are making heroic efforts to correct this condition, so far as lies within their power, by forbidding some of these long hauls, but the fact remains that the people in that rigorous climate must have fuel, and the evil can not be entirely eradicated until this lignite coal is made more generally available.

All of this coal imported into North and South Dakota and a substantial portion of that consumed by Minnesota can and should be replaced by lignite from the Dakota fields if the lignite is properly prepared, by means of drying or carbonizing or briquetting, or such combinations of these processes as the market demands.

Our leading engineers and chemists have for many years decried the wasteful practice of burning coal on the grates in common use. They have time and again shown that it is far more economical to break the coal up, by means of carbonization, into its constituent elements of solid carbon, gas, ammonia, and oils and tars, thus releasing these several valuable products for use in their respective important fields.

Because of the shortcomings, from a fuel standpoint, inherent in the nature of the lignite itself, it will never be used to any great extent in its raw state. The one fact of its 30 to 40 per cent content of water would of itself prevent its use elsewhere than in the immediate vicinity of the mine. This treatment or carbonization of the lignite, therefore, which is absolutely essential to its more general use, is strictly in accordance with modern scientific requirements and methods.

Some progress has been made in the way of better utilization of this lignite, but so far the development has not been such as to prevent people from readily paying a very considerable differential in favor of good coal. Instructive experiments have been made by the United States Bureau of Mines, the State of North Dakota, and the Province of Saskatchewan, Canada, which bring the matter measurably nearer to a satisfactory solution.

The gulf between the laboratory experiments and the large commercial industry should be bridged at once, and it should be done by governmental agencies. This span is already partly constructed, and the money asked for in this bill is required to complete the work by our own Bureau of Mines.

Instead of trying to burn the raw lignite in the primitive and wasteful ways now employed it should be modified to produce several products, each peculiarly adapted to a particular commercial need, namely:

1. Dried lignite, for use on automatic stokers and in fuel-gas producers. Because of its more or less comminuted condition the dried lignite can not be handled advantageously by hand, but it can be used very satisfactorily by mechanical means.

2. Powdered fuel, from the dried, pulverized lignite, for use in cement kilns, railroad locomotives, and other large furnaces. Because of its high volatile content this pulverized lignite makes an exceptionally good powdered fuel.

3. Dried lignite briquets, for large hand-fired industrial furnaces and heating plants. Where it is necessary to handle the dried lignite with a fireman's shovel it must be briquetted. Tests of these dried lignite briquets in commercial boiler furnaces have proved them to be fully equal in every respect to good Illinois and Indiana bituminous coals.

4. Carbonized lignite, for use in power-gas producers. Tests of this product in carload lots have proved it to be a very exceptional and unexcelled fuel for this purpose. It is of about the same analysis as Pennsylvania anthracite coal. In carbonizing the lignite the objectionable tar found in all coals containing a substantial quantity of volatile matter is removed, and the gas goes to the cylinder of the gas engine clean and tar free. For the production of power in this way carbonized lignite is fully equal to anthracite coal, charcoal, or bituminous coke.

5. Carbonized lignite briquets, for domestic service in house heating stoves and furnaces, fireplaces, and cooking ranges. This fuel, ton for ton, compares favorably in every way with anthracite coal, and is an ideal domestic fuel in such rigorous climates as those of North Dakota and Alaska. In climates where the thermometer not infrequently goes to 40 below zero this demand is an immediate and very large one.

In carbonizing the lignite valuable by-products in the form of gas, ammonia, and oils and tars are obtained.

The gas yield is upward of 10,000 cubic feet per ton of lignite. It has a heating value of 400 to 450 British thermal units per cubic foot.

A little more than one-half of the gas is necessary to carry on the carbonizing process; the balance can be used as a city gas for cooking, or for lighting if burned in a mantle, for furnace fuel, or for generating power by means of a gas engine.

The ammonia can be recovered as ammonium sulphate, a valuable fertilizer; as anhydrous ammonia, for refrigerating purposes; or it may be treated as a source of other nitrogen products, some of which are of vital importance in the manufacture of explosives.

Just what should be done with the tar and oil products in this country remains to be determined; this is an industry in itself, but this tar is known to contain substantial quantities of benzol, toluol, and other light oils, and the bases of many of the coal-tar dyes and chemicals. This industry is well developed in Germany, and I have in my hand a very instructive chart showing the uses made in Germany of the various fractions of the lignite oils and tars produced in the carbonization of German lignites. Prominent among these products are benzine and motor spirit.

In using raw lignite, as is done under the present practice, thousands of tons of screenings are annually wasted. The coal is forked over in the mine room and screened again at the surface when being loaded into railroad cars. If the problem is handled as outlined above, this waste would be eliminated, every pound of lignite broken from the seam would be put to some profitable use.

The raw lignite can not be stored economically; the treated product can; and this results in another large saving, in that the mines can operate under stable conditions the year around, instead of only during the winter months, as at present.

Some study should also be directed to designing appropriate apparatus for these classes of fuels instead of using devices already on the market intended to consume fuels of quite different character.

Unquestionably the experiments so far conducted open up very large economic and commercial possibilities, and I am confident that a little wider and more complete investigation will point the way for the establishment of carbonizing and briquetting plants throughout the lignite-bearing sections of the country, thus bringing effectively into the industrial world one of our largest natural resources, and resulting not only in the production of a first-class solid fuel so much needed, but in the saving of many by-products valuable in war as well as peace, and in easing up on the overburdened transportation system of the Nation.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Has the gentleman presented this subject to the Bureau of Mines, and has he tried to have these investigations made by one of the mining experiment stations which have been authorized to be established by the Bureau of Mines in different sections of the country?

Mr. NORTON. I will say to the gentleman, I have done this, and I have been given reasonable assurance that under existing laws and under the appropriations which have been made for the establishment of mining experiment stations of the United States Bureau of Mines throughout the country that a mining experiment station will be established during the present year somewhere in the Northwest given over entirely to the carrying on of investigations to discover practical processes of briquetting lignite coal and of investigations to discover practical ways of developing the mining and wider use of lignite coal for fuel purposes.

The annual appropriation now available for one of these mining experiment stations is but $25,000. The Bureau of Mines thinks that this year the bureau should have an appropriation of at least a hundred thousand dollars to go into this work in a full and thorough manner in order to put the business of briquetting of lignite coals and the use of lignite coal by-products on a commercial basis and give the lignite coal industry an impetus, so that men who have private capital to invest will have confidence in the industry and will make use of the processes of mining and briquetting that may be found to be most practical and that may be recommended by the Bureau of Mines. I have had a bill before the House for some time for this purpose, and I hope to be able soon to have this bill reported to the House by the Committee on Mines and Mining. I trust when it does come before the House it may be acted upon favorably. At this time I merely wish to again call attention to and to emphasize the great importance of the development of the lignite coal fields of the Nation, both from its fuel possibilities and from the possibilities of securing from this coal in carbonizing and briquetting processes by-products of great value to the needs of the Nation at this particular time. The expenditure of a hundred thousand dollars by the Government for the development of a great natural resource of the Nation could not be expended in any way to better advantage than to encourage the development of the immense lignite coal fields of the West and Southwest. [Applause.]

The following are remarks which I made on a feature of this subject during the debate in the House on June 23, 1916:

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Page 110, after line 4, add a new paragraph, as follows:

"'For special investigation of lignite coals with a view to their most efficient treatment and use, especially with reference to their utilization in producing fuel for internal-combustion engines and in supplying benzine, toluene, and other basic materials required by the dyestuff and related chemical industries, $50,000.'"

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I trust the chairman will accept this meritorious amendment.

One of the most important questions at the present time before the people of this country is the price and supply of gasoline and crude petroleum.

Due to the rapid development and the growing uses of automobile and other internal-combustion engines during the past few years, and the consequent increased use of gasoline for power production, the supply of gasoline and crude petroleum, from which for the most part gasoline is obtained, threatens soon to be exhausted. The production of crude oil in the United States and the entire world during the past 15 years is given in the following table, which summarizes in round numbers the total marketed production of crude petroleum in the United States from 1900 to 1915, inclusive, and shows for comparison the crude-oil production of the entire world during that period, in barrels of 42 gallons:

Year.	United States.	Entire world.
1900	63,600,000	149,100,000
1901	69,400,000	167,100,000
1902	88,800,000	182,000,000
1903	100,500,000	194,800,000
1904	117,100,000	218,300,000
1905	134,700,000	215,400,000
1906	126,500,000	214,000,000
1907	166,100,000	261,900,000
1908	178,500,000	285,100,000
1909	183,200,000	298,400,000
1910	209,600,000	327,600,000
1911	220,400,000	345,700,000
1912	222,900,000	352,500,000
1913	248,400,000	384,700,000
1914	265,800,000	400,500,000
1915	267,400,000	(2)

[1] Estimated. [2] No figures available.

This shows that last year the production of crude petroleum in the United States amounted to 267,400,000 barrels. The production of gasoline in the United States last year amounted to about 41,000,000 barrels. It is estimated by the United States Geological Survey that the amount of crude petroleum remaining in the oil fields of the United States is 7,629,000,000 barrels.

The following table gives the production of the 10 principal oil fields of the United States up to and including the year 1915, and shows the present gasoline factor of each field and the percentage of exhaustion of each field:

Field.	Present gasoline factor (per cent).	Production including 1915 (millions of barrels).	Estimated percentage of exhaustion.
Appalachian	25	1,150	74
Lima-Indiana	12	438	93
Illinois	18	251	60
Mid-Continent	18	617	50
North Texas	20	44	41
Northwest Louisiana	20	58	47
Gulf Coast	3	236	79
Colorado	20	11	79
Wyoming	20	12	5
California	2½	835	34

With the exception of the Appalachian field, the Lima-Indiana field, and the Colorado field, all of these oil fields in the United States have had their principal development since the year 1900.

Taking into account the productive possibilities of all pools demonstrated to contain oil, as well as the productive possibilities of untested areas in which the geologic evidence is promising, the following conservative estimates of the percentage of exhaustion and of the quantity of petroleum that remains available for commercial extraction has been made by the Bureau of Mines:

Field.	Estimated percentage of exhaustion of total oil content.	Petroleum remaining in fields (barrels).
Appalachian	70	481,000,000
Lima-Indiana	93	31,000,000
Illinois	51	244,000,000
Mid-Continent	25	1,874,000,000
North Texas	8	484,000,000
Northwest Louisiana	22	124,000,000
Gulf	13	1,500,000,000
Colorado	65	6,000,000
Wyoming and Montana	2	540,000,000
California	26	2,345,000,000
Total		7,629,000,000

At the present rate of consumptiton of gasoline and crude petroleum this estimated supply would last the United States for only about 26 years. Thus it is at once seen that a serious question confronts us to discover some other source of supply for motor spirits, or a substitute for gasoline.

Recent investigations that have been carried out on a small scale by Prof. Babcock, of the University of North Dakota, at the substation of the State School of Mines, at Hebron, N. Dak., disclose that the lignite coal fields of the United States contain an almost inexhaustible supply of light oils which can be used in internal-combustion engines as a substitute for gasoline.

It is estimated by the United States Geological Survey that the original supply of lignite coals in the United States is 1,087,514,400,000 short tons.

Lignite coal is found chiefly in the western part of the United States, in the territory extending from Texas, through Colorado, Wyoming, Montana, and the Dakotas. In this area there is a comparative scarcity of bituminous coal and a negligible quantity of anthracite coal.

The railroad industries requiring fuel of a high character are obliged to haul bituminous coal from the East or to employ petroleum or otherwise burn raw lignite. The main objections to the use of raw subbituminous coal—sometimes called black lignite—and the brown lignite are: It rapidly weathers and disintegrates; it fires spontaneously.

When used in locomotives it throws sparks for long distances, setting fire to crops and houses; moreover, much of the fuel is wasted under forced draft.

On the other hand, to transport bituminous coal and anthracite coal from the East is expensive.

While petroleum is satisfactory to the fuel users, it is becoming increasingly expensive, and it is exceedingly wasteful to use the raw oil as a fuel. Moreover, the resources, as I have called attention to, are becoming rapidly depleted, and the country must look for other sources of mineral oil than from petroleum wells.

Lignitic coals of the Western States vary widely in composition, containing moisture as mined ranging from 10 to 40 per cent, and ranging in appearance from the subbituminous coal or high-grade black lignite (which behaves very similar to bituminous coal) to the brown lignite, found in some parts of North Dakota and Texas, which is little more than peat.

Necessarily there is quite a variation in composition which requires careful investigation to determine what method will produce the best briquettes and the maximum quantity of by-products.

In 1909 a small experiment station was started by the College of Mining Engineering of the University of North Dakota, at Hebron, under the direction of Prof. E. J. Babcock, and the last few years a cooperation was effected on a very small scale with the Federal Bureau of Mines in order that the results might be published and thus be of benefit in the study and utilization of the lignites on the Government lands. At this experimental station, a description of which is given in Bulletin 89 of the Bureau of Mines, entitled "Economic Methods for Using Waste Lignites," briquettes have been made which have withstood handling and weathering for six months or more in the open air. There were made from lignite which would begin weathering and disintegrating in a few days. They have also been dried and burned in a type of furnace and tried on local railroad locomotives. It is reported that 1 ton of briquettes was equal to 1 ton of the best bituminous coal in keeping up steam, and equal to a ton of the best anthracite coal for use in furnaces and heating stoves.

The analysis of the briquettes is not unlike that of the Pocahontas coals, except for slightly higher ash. The briquettes are almost smokeless. The briquettes which have been made have employed tar for a binder, the tar being brought from the East. Petroleum residues would be available for the same purpose, and one line of investigation would be to determine the best binder in the various localities where lignite is produced. Some tar is produced in the carbonization of the lignite, but not sufficient to make the briquetts, and moreover it is probable that in most cases the tar derived would be of greater value on account of the by-products that could be produced than the ordinary tar of commerce.

In the carbonization of lignites, as demonstrated by Prof. Babcock, very important by-products are produced. These products vary widely with the lignite and with the degree to which carbonization is carried. The yield of gas is large for the partly dried lignite, reaching 10,000 to 12,000 cubic feet per ton, according to Prof. Babcock, which is about the same as that from a high-grade bituminous coal. Further, the evolution of gas is much more rapid. The residues may be briquetted. The gas has been tried in gas engines, and tests made in comparison with standard city gas, and it was found that the lignite gas was especially satisfactory. It is believed that there is a large field for the production of power through the establishment of large by-product plants.

Ammonia and tar are also produced in the carbonization of the coal. According to Prof. Babcock approximately 50 pounds of tar can be recovered from 1 ton of partly dried lignite. This tar is very high in paraffin ingredients. Prof. Babcock estimates that there is produced from a ton of dried lignite coal at different temperatures 5 to 6 gallons of crude lignite oils, 2 gallons of crude benzol, 2 to 3 gallons of hard tar, 50 to 60 pounds of ammonia sulphate, and 20 pounds of tar acids. Benzol is one of the compounds used in the manufacture of dyestuffs and explosives and is an excellent substitute for gasoline for use in internal-combustion engines. Prof. Babcock has also produced by distillation from lignites oil which has been found to be unusually well suited in the concentration of ore by the flotation process. It is evident to anyone who has given the subject consideration that our western lignite coals present a field for investigation which promises very much for the development of those parts of the country hitherto retarded by the lack of fuel in its various forms and also offers the greatest possibilities through the enormous amounts of lignite in substitution for petroleum, which is intrinsically too valuable to the country to permit its use as a fuel.

The investigation should be carried on in the most practical way possible to obtain information regarding the different lignite fields and how each can best be utilized. Such work will not necessarily have to be carried on by the establishment of local stations, but can be most economically and best done at the general stations in the West, where the materials may be shipped for testing.

One important use for lignite which deserves further development is that in the gas producer. This would be eminently of advantage where it is desired to obtain power at points where water was scarce and where the by-products would be of less value on account of difficulties and expense of transportation.

From the carbonization of lignite coal can be obtained unpurified gas that has a heating value of upward of 400 British thermal units per cubic foot. From 10,000 to 12,000 cubic feet of volatile gas is contained in each ton of ordinary western lignite coal.

The work that is proposed to be carried on, under authority of the amendment I have offered, is work that unquestionably should be done by the United States and is one of the most important steps that can, at this time, be taken in the way of industrial preparedness for our immediate and future needs in this country.

Prof. Babcock, who is the leading authority in this country on lignite coals, their composition, and the commercial and economic possibilities of these coals, has told me that the limited investigation that he has already carried on, which has disclosed the presence in these coals of high-grade tars, tar acids, including carbolic acid, and the basic elements used in the manufacture of aniline dyes and high explosives, has opened up marvelous economic and commercial possibilities that he feels certain wider and more complete investigations and experiments would show to be practical and would point the way for the establishment of manufacturing plants throughout the country to briquette this coal and to use the by-products from the briquetting process in different commercial activities.

In Germany during the present European war it is reported that large quantities of benzol are being produced from lignite coals for use in internal-combustion engines. The statistics of 1913 show that Germany in that year mined 87,000,000 tons of lignite, which was about the same as the amount of bituminous coal mined. Most of the lignite mined was briquetted and sold at practically the same price as briquettes of bituminous coal.

The tremendous importance of securing a large supply of a good substitute for gasoline such as benzol has proven to be is better understood when the fact is considered that in the United States to-day the horsepower of gasoline internal-combustion engines is twice that of the horsepower of all engines driven by steam.

As I have already stated, it is estimated that the total supply of lignite coal in the United States is 1,087,514,400,000 short tons. Now, from each ton of lignite in the process of briqueting, upward of 2 gallons of benzol can be secured, in addition to other valuable by-products, as tar, tar acids, ammonia compounds, etc.

While the estimated supply of crude petroleum in the ground in the United States is sufficient to supply the present rate of consumption in the United States for about 26 years, the quantity of benzol that can be secured from carbonization or distillation of our lignite coals would, at the present rate of consumption, meet our needs for use in all kinds of internal-combustion engines for more than a thousand years.

The lignite coal fields are widely distributed, being found in Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, Texas, Wyoming, North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, Washington, and other States.

It is estimated that there are 697,921,200,000 short tons of lignite in North Dakota, 1,020,300,000 tons in South Dakota, and 23,000,000,000 tons in Texas.

There should be appropriated at this time at least $100,000 to carry out a thorough and complete investigation of the commercial practicability of the use of lignite coal as a fuel in briquetted form and of the value of its by-products for use in internal-combustion engines, and for supplying the basic elements needed in the manufacture of aniline dyes and high explosives. But I have offered this amendment proposing an appropriation of $50,000, with the hope that the chairman of the committee will accept this amendment as a compromise amount for the actual amount that is needed and which should be appropriated for this purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. That each lease shall be for not to exceed 2,560 acres of land to be described by the legal subdivisions of the public-land surveys, if surveyed, to be described by the legal subdivisions of the public-land surveys; if unsurveyed, to be surveyed by the Government at the expense of the applicant for lease, in accordance with the laws, rules, and regulations governing the survey of public lands, and the lands leased shall be conformed to and taken in accordance with the legal subdivisions of such survey; deposits made to cover expense of surveys shall be deemed appropriated for that purpose; and any excess deposits may be repaid to the person or persons making such deposits or their legal representatives: Provided, That the land embraced in any one lease shall be in compact form, the length of which shall not exceed two and one-half times its width.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, line 17, page 44, should be made to conform to the other provision. The words "or persons" should be stricken out and the words "associations or corporations" inserted.

The question was taken and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, also, in order to make it conform, the word "may" should be stricken out in line 16, and there should be inserted in lieu thereof the word "shall."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

GENERAL PROVISIONS APPLICABLE TO COAL, PHOSPHATE, OIL, AND GAS LEASES.

SEC. 19. That the Secretary of the Interior shall reserve and may exercise the authority to cancel any prospecting permit upon failure by the permittee to exercise due diligence in the prosecution of the prospecting work in accordance with the terms and conditions stated in the permit, and shall insert in every such permit issued under the provisions of this act appropriate provisions for its cancellation by him.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] as to whether or not "oil shale" should not be included in this subdivision after the word "oil"?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. What language?

Mr. RAKER. In line 8.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I suppose it would be better; yes. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that after the word "oil" in the title to insert the words "oil shale."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado:
Page 46, line 8, after the word "oil," insert the words "oil shale."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the amendment is agreed to.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 22. That no lease issued under the authority of this act shall be assigned or sublet, except with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior. The lessee may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be permitted at any time to make written relinquishment of all rights under such a lease, and upon acceptance thereof be thereby relieved of all future obligations under said lease, and may with like consent, surrender any legal subdivision of the area included within the lease. Each lease shall contain provisions for the purpose of insuring the exercise of reasonable diligence, skill, and care in the operation of said property; a provision that such rules for the safety and welfare of the miners and for the prevention of undue waste as may be prescribed by said Secretary shall be observed, including a restriction of the workday to not exceeding eight hours in any one day for underground workers except in cases of emergency, provisions securing the workmen complete freedom of purchase, requiring the payment of wages at least twice a month in lawful money of the United States, and providing proper rules and regulations to insure the fair and just weighing or measurement of the coal mined by each miner, and such other provisions as he may deem necessary for the protection of the interests of the United States, for the prevention of monopoly, and for the safeguarding of the public welfare: Provided, That none of such provisions shall be in conflict with the laws of the State in which the leased property is situated.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, the provisions found on page 49, from line 12 and down to and including the word "United States" in line 24, read as follows:

A provision that such rules for the safety and welfare of the miners and for the prevention of undue waste as may be prescribed by said Secretary shall be observed, including a restriction of the workday to not exceeding eight hours in any one day for underground workers except in cases of emergency, provisions securing the workmen complete freedom of purchase, requiring the payment of wages at least twice a month in lawful money of the United States, and providing proper rules and regulations to insure the fair and just weighing or measurement of the coal mined by each miner, and such other provisions as he may deem necessary for the protection of the interests of the United States.

They were inserted heretofore when the bill was under consideration on my motion, and the committee, when the matter was taken up this time, reinserted them, and I am very happy to know that there is no objection to the provisions, and I desire to say that they are wise ones and ought to be in a law of this kind.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 26. That all moneys received from royalties and rentals under the provisions of this act, excepting those from Alaska, shall be paid into, reserved, and appropriated as a part of the reclamation fund created by the act of Congress approved June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act, but after use thereof in the construction of reclamation works and upon return to the reclamation fund of any such moneys in the manner provided by the reclamation act and acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, 50 per cent of the amounts derived from such royalties and rentals so utilized in and returned to the reclamation fund shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury after the expiration of each fiscal year to the State within the boundaries of which the leased lands or deposits are or were located, said moneys to be used by such State or subdivisions thereof for the construction and maintenance of public roads or for the support of public schools or other public educational institutions, as the legislature of the State may direct: Provided, That any moneys which may accrue to the United States under the provisions of this act from lands within the naval petroleum reserves shall be deposited in the Treasury as "Miscellaneous receipts."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Some one ought to move to amend this section. I have in a way understood the attitude of the Committee on the Public Lands on a number of the provisions of this bill, but I have never been able to understand the attitude of anyone on a provision of a bill which would withhold from certain States hundreds of millions of dollars of taxable value without making any provision whatsoever for funds or resources to take the place of the sums lost through the withholding of these lands from sale and taxation.

If this bill becomes a law hundreds of thousands and millions of acres of the most valuable lands in various Western States, with all of their valuable mineral deposits, will be withheld from sale and disposition, and will never, so far as the land values are concerned, be available as a source of revenue.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a fact that this bill provides that we are in shape to tax all the personal property and the output of the mine, both of coal and oil, so that, as a matter of fact, we will really get what taxable interest there is in this land, although the real title remains in the Government?

Mr. MONDELL. If that fact satisfies the gentleman from California, he is very easily satisfied. A proposition that lays a perpetual tax of at least one-eighth, and possibly one-fourth, for all time on the enormous mineral values of a State takes all those sums out of a State, leaving none of the land values from which royalties are derived as the subject of taxation. If in that situation he is satisfied, because an additional burden may be laid, he is very easily satisfied in matters of taxation.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman must realize that we are not always satisfied with all the things that come and with all the provisions of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. FERRIS. Does the gentleman think he ought to have five minutes more?

Mr. MONDELL. I think I ought to have 30 minutes, but I am going to be very reasonable and ask for only 5 minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. I think the gentleman has used so much time that he ought to retire without any more; but, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that at the expiration of 10 minutes, 5 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and 5 minutes by a member of the committee, all debate upon this section and amendments thereto close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that at the expiration of 10 minutes—5 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Wyoming and 5 minutes by a member of the committee—all debate upon this section and amendments thereto close. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. It is my opinion that in all the history of legislation nothing of this kind has ever been proposed in a free, self-governing country. Let us assume, if you please, that a hundred years ago the great State of Pennsylvania had been deprived of the right to tax all of its coal and all of its oil land values, save and except as it could lay a tax on output, what would be the condition of that great Commonwealth today under those circumstances? Why, communities would be impoverished, roads would be impassable, schoolhouses would be of a character not fit for the education of the children of an enlightened community. And yet that is what it is proposed to do here, namely, to withhold for all time the right to tax all of the enormous values that are in these lands. And the communities are to be compelled to build roads, to educate their children, to maintain public order, without the right to tax these lands or their values. We are asking that in lieu of the taxes that would have been secured from these lands half of the royalties collected shall be paid to the States and communities which produced them. Is that unreasonable? What are we proposing to do with the money? Put it in the reclamation fund? Put it in the reclamation fund from California or Colorado or Wyoming in order to build reclamation projects in other States. That is a worthy purpose, but it will not help to build any schoolhouses, and it will not provide any roads, and it will not help to maintain public order in the communities from which these royalties have been derived. It is all very well for the communities that do not have any of these minerals to secure the benefit of all these royalties, but the States and communities that have produced them are entitled to at least enough of them to recompense them for the loss they suffer by reason of the fact that the lands are not to become private property and thus a source of public revenue through taxation.

Mr. CRAMTON. Is not the gentleman cheered up by the hope that eventually the reclamation fund will yield half of it to his State?

Mr. MONDELL. I am cheered by the fact that if the bill becomes a law in this shape the lash of public opinion will eventually compel the modification of this provision in order to do justice.

Within a week I have had letters from a western State asking if I approved that provision. Well, I have tried to be kind to my colleagues, and therefore I did not suggest that there were people nearer home that ought to be consulted about it. But there is no justification for a provision such as the bill contains. It ought never to have been in the bill. My understanding was when the bill was originally drawn that it was to provide that half of the proceeds of royalties was to remain in the States and community to reimburse and recompense them for the loss of taxing values, and the other half was to go to the reclamation fund. And that is what should have been done and what ought to be done now. I realize it is useless to offer an amendment to accomplish that purpose here and now, but I still hope it will be done before the bill becomes a law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, the speech of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is as remarkable as it is monstrous. He knows, and the House knows, that the aim and the effort of the House has been and that the effort of the western Members has been to hold on to what they have and not to get more. I have had to help them to keep them from having those things taken away from them; and here the gentleman from Wyoming gets up, when he knows that he has gotten for his section every penny that the House will stand for, and arraigns those western Members on the Public Lands Committee. He gets up here and indicts the members of the committee from the West for not having done their full duty in protecting all this money and getting all this royalty dumped into some county schoolhouse district in his own district. The public have some rights here. The western members of my committee have been true to the West. They have fought so hard for the West in season and out that they have made it almost hideous for those of us who were trying to protect the Treasury.

The answer is that the Members on both sides have fought valiantly to get every cent of it. None of the western members on my committee have been recreant in their duty. The gentleman from Wyoming has no monopoly in trying to claim everything and get all the royalty placed out in his own State. He appeals here where there is no chance for relief. They appealed when there was a chance and they succeeded remarkably well. He comes in here when he knows that the members of the Committee on the Public Lands have performed more than anybody could anticipate that they could get, and then he issues the plaintive appeal, "Why do you not be more aggressive? Why do you not get more?" This does not seem fair to me. It does not seem square. It should not be tolerated or go unchallenged.

Mr. MONDELL. Would the gentleman like to have a provision like this apply to the oil and coal of his State?

Mr. FERRIS. In my State they take every cent of the oil and coal royalties and put them into the Treasury. We do not get a cent. We are not trying to bunco the country out of it and we are not trying to indict anybody who has by hard work gotten more than they are entitled to, as the gentleman is now doing.

This thing should not go on. The gentleman from Wyoming has made 20 or 30 speeches here to-day, and every one could be dissected and every one could be answered and found to be based on self-assertive motives and on politics, to advance his own ambition. There is no longer any sense in such a propaganda. The members of the Public Lands Committee shall not sit here and be abused and run over without somebody at least telling the truth.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman know how many gentlemen are here listening to his harangue?

Mr. FERRIS. You are here. I am speaking for your benefit.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman wants to conclude his bill this afternoon? I want to say to the gentleman that he can not be abusive here unless it is with a quorum present. "The gentleman from Wyoming" knows his rights upon this floor and he proposes to maintain them. There are things that could be said about this bill that I do not want to say, but that I am tempted to say.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not yield further to the gentleman. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman time to say anything he wants to about this bill. [Applause.]

This nonsense and foolishness has gone on long enough. There is an answer to every word that has been said by the gentleman from Wyoming. There is an answer, and I could move now and bring a quorum here, and he could move to strike out every line here, and he would not have votes enough to make a respectable appearance. He knows that the efforts that these western members of the Public Lands Committee have made here every year have been to help the West. He understands the efforts of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and those of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT], and those of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], and those of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], and those of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], and the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. WALTON], MAYS, TILLMAN, CHURCH, and the rest. He knows all the members of this committee have been to do what? To get everything they could for the West, faithful and true. The gentleman from Wyoming, with his long experience, attempts to place his own neighbors and his own friends and his own colleagues on both his side and on this side in an unfair attitude. He has not offered any amendment. If he did, he would do well to get his own vote. It is not right; it is not fair. We ought not to proceed this way longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 27. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to prescribe necessary and proper rules and regulations and to do any and all things necessary to carry out and accomplish the purposes of this act: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed or held to affect the rights of the States or other local authority to exercise any rights which they may have to levy and collect taxes upon improvements, output of mines, or other rights, property, or assets of any lessee of the United States.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] ought to have been here long enough to have learned better than to lecture Members who are here trying to do their duty and expressing their opinion on legislation before this body. The gentleman has a way of getting restive when people do not entirely agree with him. He knows perfectly well——

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MONDELL. That he himself does not entirely approve some of the provisions contained in this bill, which he is trying to defend.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order. The gentleman from Wyoming will suspend until the point of order is made.

Mr. RAKER. Let us not tangle up this discussion——

Mr. MONDELL. Is it the gentleman's view that the gentleman from Oklahoma may proceed to lecture Members on this floor and then they be expected to sit quietly in their seats and tamely acquiesce?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman submit to a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Wyoming be kind enough to confine his remarks to the bill pending and to the section thereof?

Mr. MONDELL. Has anyone made that point of order, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I asked the gentleman if he would yield for a question.

Mr. MONDELL. I desire to know whether anyone has made that point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has made the suggestion in the spirit of harmony. If the gentleman does not desire to observe it, it is up to him. For what purpose does the gentleman from Colorado rise?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I rise to ask the gentleman from Wyoming to submit to a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I want to ask the gentleman from Wyoming if he does not himself think it is uncalled for, unwarranted, and unfair to us Members from the West, who are on this Public Lands Committee, for him to get up on this floor and say he does not think we have made a proper effort to protect the interests of our States, and proceed to recite how many acres of oil lands there are in each State, and how much money we are going to lose in royalties and taxes, when he fully knows that we have been constantly holding hearings and earnestly fighting for four months on this bill almost day after day, doing our utmost to protect the interests of the West, and we have secured the best possible bill that can be passed through this House, and I think everyone knows it?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan will state his point of order.

Mr. CRAMTON. Under what rule is it permissible, after the gentleman from Wyoming has been admonished not to speak except upon the section, for the gentleman from Colorado to interrupt and speak on some other subject?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I did not interrupt the gentleman. He yielded to me for a question.

Mr. CRAMTON. He can not yield to him to speak out of order.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I am not speaking out of order. I am propounding an interrogatory after first and formally having obtained permission to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming will resume.

Mr. MONDELL. I have good reason to have some feeling about this section. In the first place, when this bill was first introduced, I had promises as to what would be the provisions of this section, which promises did not pan out. I think that gentlemen should make an earnest effort to secure for their States and communities a portion of these royalties which, under the provisions of the bill, may go to distant States. It is true the paragraph we are now considering provides that the States may tax the output of the mines and wells. No such legislation as that is necessary. The Congress can not give the States of the Union the right to tax mine output. The States have that right, and they have it to just as large a degree before this section goes into the bill as they have it after the section is placed in the bill. By a system of leases vast values are to be permanently withheld from taxation. Great communities will be built up which the people locally must provide for with schools and roads and the maintenance of order. These great values in royalties are to be taken from them. True, these values go to a group of Western States for a very useful purpose, that of reclamation. But of what benefit would it be to the people of a great oil-producing section of my State or your State or a great coal-producing section of our States, in which towns and cities were built up, in which roads and schools would be necessary—of what benefit would it be to them to have reclamation works built in some distant section? What consolation would it be to them to know that the moneys that have been taken from their community have built a reclamation project somewhere hundreds or a thousand miles away? There is no reason on earth why at least 50 per cent of these royalties should not be retained in and paid to the States and communities where they are produced. Even that, in my opinion, would not compensate the communities for the losses in the opportunity to tax these values which would be afforded were the lands sold and held in private ownership, in the way in which such lands and properties are held all over the country.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. RAKER. Before the reclamation act was approved, is it not a fact that all of the money received from the sale of public lands went into the general fund of the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. MONDELL. Five per cent of it went to the States in lieu of taxes.

Mr. RAKER. But outside of that?

Mr. MONDELL. That 5 per cent went to the States to reimburse them for the taxes they lost before the sale. And then the lands become taxable, and the communities are sustained on those taxes. But you are proposing to permanently hold from taxation millions of acres of the most valuable land in the West. No taxes can ever be levied on those land values. The only taxes you can secure from them are those levied on the improvements upon them, and possibly from a mine-output tax laid on top of this great burden of royalty. Now, it does not help the case to say that, having taken these royalties away and out of the State, you may lay an additional burden in the form of an output tax. In some States you can not do that because of a constitutional provision that one class of property shall not be taxed more heavily than another. Pennsylvania can and does lay a mine-output tax, but that is over and above a tax on the value of the lands and their mineral content. Under the provisions of this bill the States affected are to be perpetually deprived of the opportunity to tax the coal and oil lands now in public ownership. They should have at least half of the royalties to make up for those losses.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

Mr. RAKER. I am fearful that the gentleman is overlooking this important fact: In every oil well that is bored and every mine that is developed, when you get the oil out and the coal out, you have got nothing left. If it is private ownership you get nothing from taxation; but under this bill you get a certain amount for reclamation purposes, and then afterwards 50 per cent for our school and road purposes. I should like to see more of it go for that purpose, but we have struggled until we are black in the face to get that amount, and the gentleman remembers that——

Mr. MONDELL. I can not yield for a long speech.

Mr. RAKER. Let me make this statement.

Mr. MONDELL. I know the gentleman has struggled. I can not yield for a speech.

Mr. RAKER. Just one question.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman is a member of the conference committee, he will have an opportunity to agree with the Senate on this proposition. The Senate have taken the right view of it. They have made the proper provision. So far the House committee has declined to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 28. That the deposits of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, and gas, herein referred to, in lands valuable for such minerals shall be subject to disposition only in the form and manner provided in this act, except as to valid claims existent at date of the passage of this act and thereafter maintained in compliance with the laws under which initiated, which claims may be perfected under such laws: Provided, That any person who, at the time of any withdrawal order, was, or on January 1, 1918, a bona fide occupant or claimant of oil or gas lands not withdrawn from entry, and who had previously performed all acts under then existing laws necessary to valid locations thereof except to make discovery, and upon which discovery had not been made prior to the passage of this act, and who had performed a substantial amount of work of not less than $500 on or for the benefit of each location if application therefor shall be made within three months from the passage of this act shall be entitled to prospecting permits thereon upon the same terms and conditions as other permits provided for in this act: And provided further, That such lands are not reserved for the use of the Navy: Provided, however, That no claimant who has been guilty of fraud in the location of any oil claim or gas-bearing lands shall be entitled to any of the benefits of this section: And provided further, That within one year after the passage of this act where any land has been included within an oil withdrawal or classification heretofore made after bona fide entry upon the same by a qualified homestead or desert-land entryman and where said entryman has complied with the requirements of the law relating to such entries up to the time when said withdrawal was made, said entryman or the patentee under such entry shall be given a preference right to a prospecting permit for the same under the same terms and conditions as prescribed in this act.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have a quorum to consider this important piece of legislation.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment.

Mr. RAKER. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that we are within one page of finishing the bill. I realize the feelings of the gentleman from Wyoming, and if he had a way to express them without interfering with the immediate passage of the bill I would not suggest his refraining. If we delay the bill to-night in any way it may be thrown over for two weeks. I suggest to the gentleman, although he has proper cause for retaliation, that he let this thing go by. We are within 10 or 15 minutes of the passage of the bill, and I think it would be very hurtful to have it delayed and not passed to-night. I urge upon the gentleman the withdrawal of his point of order.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think if the gentleman from Wyoming will yield that he has up to this time demonstrated his desire for the passage of the bill, both from personal consideration and others, and I hope he will continue in this spirit and let us pass the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming insist on the point of no quorum?

Mr. MONDELL. I will withdraw the point of order for the moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 52, line 20, after the word "who," strike out the words "and perform a substantial amount of work of not less than $500 on or for the benefit of each location," and insert in lieu thereof the words "has performed work or expended on or for the benefit of such location an amount equal in the aggregate to $250 for each location."

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, my thought about the matter is that there are a great many comparatively poor people in the West who have one or more locations on oil claims, and when they are required, as they are, to first make a valid location, and they do annual assessment work besides, $250 is enough expenditure on each claim to insure good faith. I feel that this requirement of $500 is an unnecessary hardship upon these people, and will not inure to the benefit of the Government at all, but have a tendency to inflict an unjust and unnecessary burden upon many good people, people of ordinary means, that need all of their money and can use it in a much better way toward the development. I think in the interest of legitimate discovery and honest development it would be beneficial to reduce the amount from $500 to $250, and I hope my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, the provision in question permits certain parties to have a preferred right to perfect the claim. The gentleman brings in a proposition that was not put before the committee. It reduces the requirement seriously.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It is merely a matter of cash expenditure, required to insure good faith. It does not require serious consideration to determine the fairness of this proposition.

Mr. CRAMTON. It cuts it in two and brings it nearly to zero.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Two hundred and fifty dollars for a poor man is a good deal of money to require him to expend, usually uselessly, just to demonstrate his good faith.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman will be a member of the committee of conference, and the conferees will have full powers in the matter.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not desire to take up much time or to get into any extended argument or discussion; but I do feel that this sum ought to be cut down at least one-half, and I trust it will be.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado will be adopted. I think it is a very proper amendment, and it still leaves a very considerable requirement, a sufficient requirement, to guarantee good faith on the part of the locator. Some claims have not been held for a very great length of time, but where the locator has gone on in good faith and spent the amount of money which the amendment calls for, it is sufficient. All that we do in this case is to give the locator a right to lease. The only advantage he has, he does not have to lease on a competitive basis, but leases on a fixed royalty. It is not much we are giving him at best. Certainly if he has shown his good faith he ought to be given that opportunity. The entire section restricts very greatly the rights and opportunities of those who have located, gone on the land in good faith, and the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado will make it possible for some folks to secure this opportunity to lease who would not otherwise have it. Surely the man who has located, who has made some expenditure on the land, is more entitled to a lease than some stranger who had never shown his good faith in regard to it. The amendment still leaves the section far from satisfactory, but it does help a little.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This provision, particularly lines 6 to 12, with the addition of the words "oil shales," has been one of the special provisions in the bill that has been given more careful consideration by the committee, and especially by a subcommittee consisting of Senator LENROOT and myself, who spent much time on it. The committee had many conferences, and it is one vital to legislation of this kind, because it repeals all the laws relating to the subject in hand. The purpose was to protect those who had valid claims. I believe that this repealing clause does that, particularly now those newcomers who were really protected, but there could have been a withdrawal made, and therefore the committee has added this proviso in the way of a saving clause to the interests of those who have gone onto the public domain and expended a certain amount of work and money, who have done everything except the mere fact of discovery. If this bill passes, finding then a well of 1,000 feet without oil, they will be protected, and they can complete their rights by taking out a permit, so that no one will be injured, and it will finally wind up the features in regard to changing the system from patents to leases, and settle the great question that has been before the public for so many years. I believe both will turn out successfully.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: After the word "or," on page 53, line 11, insert the words "his assigns or successors in interest."

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I think that is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 53, line 11, after the word "or," insert the words "his assigns or successors in interest."

Mr. RAKER. Of course, this is the way it came out of the committee and I was in favor of it and think it ought to be done, but I am wondering whether or not the committee desires to allow these homesteaders now to transfer their claims to the various oil companies and let them obtain the lease.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment, to insert those words after the word "entryman."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, let me inquire of the gentleman this: Does not the gentleman think, if he does that at all, and if it is advisable to do that at all, there ought to be a provision that the assignments must be made prior to January 1, so that there might not be a lot of hasty assignments at the last?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would not object to that.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman from Washington knows, and we all know who had to do with this matter in the committee, that there was great deal of claim jumping and assigning and grabbing of land, even after this bill was introduced and activities began during this year. I do not think we ought to encourage that or afford an opportunity for them to do that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the gentleman will offer that amendment to complete this I have no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. I wish the gentleman would withdraw that and let us look at it more. It can be treated in conference. It is certainly proper for any successor in interest who gets it in the regular way to have this right accorded to him, but if it develops that the Standard Oil Co. or some other oil company are sending around a lot of dummies I know the gentleman would object to it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That provision is so fair that I hate to have this go over to the Senate leaving a fair provision like that out of the bill.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not controvert what the gentleman says. It does look fair on its face, although I can see where there might be abuses. The gentleman will be upon the conference committee and he can raise the question there.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I shall not insist upon it.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. It was not considered in committee, and I want to call the gentleman's attention——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The gentleman will excuse me if I counter with another question. Were all of the amendments the gentleman offered here to-day considered in committee? If they were, then I shall grant he has asked a pertinent inquiry.

Mr. RAKER. I can not take time to answer that question.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No, I would not either, if I were the gentleman.

Mr. RAKER. Let us get to the meat of it. The gentleman, as a western man, knows that this can not apply to a homestead entryman. Therefore you are legislating now that a homestead entryman may assign his rights before he gets a patent, which can not be done. You authorize a man who has a homestead under which there is oil or coal to transfer his homestead interest.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, I will say in answer to the gentleman that that is simply talk and does not have any effect in fact. This homestead entryman might die, his assigns would be his heirs, and they would have the right to do this.

Mr. RAKER. His heirs or assigns could not assign to any of the land until a patent was issued or unless it was approved and final certificate issued.

Mr. FERRIS. Will not the gentleman agree to withdraw that and let us take it up in conference?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will agree, but at the same time I think it should be fixed right here in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington withdraw the amendment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 53, lines 2 and 3, strike out the words "in the location of any oil claims or gas-bearing land," and in lieu thereof insert "bad faith or wrongdoing in respect to any such location from claims asserted thereunder."

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment, as is apparent on its face, is to strengthen the language of this section. If you will turn to section 12, page 41, lines 7 to 10, you will find this proviso:

No person who has been guilty of any fraud, or who had knowledge or reasonable ground to know of any fraud, or who has not acted honestly and in good faith, shall be entitled to a lease under the provisions of this act.

The section we are now considering is a relief section. I think those who seek relief under this act should come with clean hands, and therefore I suggest that this provision be strengthened so that anyone who can not come with clean hands can not secure relief. I hope I can secure favorable consideration for the suggestion from the members of the committee, because I have no desire to throw a monkey wrench into this very admirable machine we have here. I would like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee, if I can, and get his views as to the language of this amendment.

Mr. FERRIS. I confess it looks to me, as I understand it, it strengthens and makes better the language. I may be in error and I would not want to accept it on the part of the committee, because it has not been considered by it, but personally I think it is better.

Mr. KEATING. It is practically the language you have on page 41, lines 7 to 10.

Mr. FERRIS. It is suggested to me by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], as he sat in his seat, that the words "bad faith and wrongdoing" might make it more restrictive to oil people and might allow a lease to be forfeited clear outside the statute. If that is true, might not the gentleman well have a care?

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment again read.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I will yield for the purpose of having the amendment read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California desires to have the amendment again read. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, the sole purpose of the amendment is to strengthen the language of the section and to make it clear that when Congress enacts a relief measure that no one who can not come forward with clean hands shall receive the benefits of that relief, and I submit that is as far as Congress should go.

Mr. ELSTON. All the gentleman adds are the words "bad faith," and what else?

Mr. KEATING. "Or wrongdoing."

Mr. ELSTON. As applied to his application or any act?

Mr. KEATING. Made in connection with the location.

Mr. SINNOTT and Mr. RAKER rose.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT].

Mr. SINNOTT. Has the gentleman any definition of the word "wrongdoing" from a legal standpoint? Is not that a very indefinite word to put into a measure of this kind?

Mr. KEATING. If the gentleman will turn to page 41, lines 7 to 10, he will find that it is provided that an entryman who has not "acted honestly" or is "guilty of bad faith" shall not be entitled to a lease under this act. "Wrongdoing" is as easily construed as "acted honestly."

Mr. SINNOTT. The phrase "wrongdoing" is not there.

Mr. KEATING. It is not.

Mr. SINNOTT. It is an indefinite phrase to put into an act.

Mr. ELSTON. Would the gentleman have any objection to using the same phraseology that is used in previous pages in respect to other relief sections?

Mr. KEATING. I believe the language I suggest is stronger.

Mr. ELSTON. It is very indefinite as to its meaning.

Mr. KEATING. You insert in one place "unless he acts in good faith," and in the other "if he acts in bad faith." One is surely as clear as the other.

Mr. ELSTON. I think the gentleman would not say that the word "wrongdoing" is ordinarily found in statutes intended to cover the point this clause does.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEATING. I would like to have three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent for three minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. Reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent that at the close of the three minutes all debate be closed on this paragraph and all amendments thereto.

Mr. MONDELL. I trust the gentleman will modify that so as to apply only to the amendment.

Mr. FERRIS. All right. Only to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] asks unanimous consent that at the expiration of the three minutes, to be used by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING], all debate on this amendment close. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, if it is agreeable to the members of the committee, as suggested by the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON], I will substitute the language used on page 41 in connection with section 12. Is that agreeable to the chairman of the committee?

Mr. FERRIS. I have no objection to it.

Mr. KEATING. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment and offer the words appearing from lines 7 to 10, page 41.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment as first proposed, and substitute in place thereof that which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KEATING: Page 53, line 1, after the word "That," strike out all down to and including the word "section," in line 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"No person who has been guilty of any fraud, or who had knowledge or reasonable grounds to know of any fraud, or who has not acted honestly and in good faith, shall be entitled to a lease under the provisions of this act."

Mr. FERRIS. I hope the gentleman will modify that and use the word "claimant" instead of "person," so that it may include corporations.

Mr. KEATING. I accept that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest, as this is dealing with another subject, we should strike out "in this act" and put in "in this section."

Mr. RAKER. The Clerk could read down, and in line 3 put in Mr. KEATING's amendment.

Mr. KEATING. I will adopt the suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. With the consent of the gentleman from Colorado, the proponent of the amendment, and without objection, the alterations will be made.

The Clerk will report the amendment as altered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KEATING: Page 53, line 1, after the word "That," strike out all down to and including the word "section," in line 4, and insert the following: "No claimant who has been guilty of any fraud, or who had knowledge or reasonable grounds to know of any fraud, or has not acted honestly and in good faith, shall be entitled to any of the benefits of the section."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I want to submit another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado submits an additional amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KEATING: Page 52, lines 24 and 25, strike out the words "thereon upon the same terms and conditions as other permits" and in lieu thereof insert the words "or leases thereon upon not less than one-eighth royalty and except as otherwise provided, upon the same terms as other permits or leases."

Mr. FERRIS. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that amendment. I am afraid it is a little far-reaching and a little too ponderous and cumbersome to settle in an amendment. It may be all right.

Mr. KEATING. I shall not insist on it if the chairman takes that attitude; but I want to say a word on the proposition. I hope the chairman and the conferees will have an opportunity to consider the matter in conference, because I think in justice to the men who are endeavoring to develop these oil lands some such provision should be put in.

For example, under the provisions of this act you can not grant to prospectors permits on a geological structure where oil has been discovered. Now, I have in mind such a structure in the State of Wyoming, which is some 20 miles long and some 6 miles wide. I am informed there is just one producing well in that entire area. There are a number of people claiming land on that structure. Under some provisions of this bill they would apparently be entitled to get prospectors' permits, but I am confident the Interior Department will rule that other provisions of the bill will prevent the issuance of prospectors' permits on a geological structure where oil has been discovered.

If that construction be given to the bill, then it will be impossible for such entrymen to get any relief. If we adopt the amendment I have suggested, it will be possible for the entryman who has acted in good faith, who has complied with the law in so far as it was possible for him to comply with the law, and who under the existing provisions would be entitled to a prospector's permit, to get a lease or a preferential right to a lease; and I think he is entitled to that, in view of the fact that he has acted in good faith; that he has expended his money; and that, except for the peculiar conditions existing where his land is located, he would be entitled to a prospector's permit. If he could secure a prospector's permit, he would, as a matter of course, secure the lease.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. KEATING. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. What about this suggestion? It would seem to me that it would hardly be probable that the department would hold as the gentleman suggested with regard to the granting of permits under this section. It provides that they shall have permits. The fact that elsewhere it is provided that permits shall not in general be granted in developed territory does not affect this provision. But assuming that were true, and that it is wise to amend, what about this feature of the situation? The amendment provides that parties shall be entitled to leases at one-eighth royalty, and, except as otherwise provided, on the same terms as other leases. Now, all leases provided for in this bill are on and after bidding. Does not your amendment bring these leases into the same category as all other leases? That is, that the parties would have to subject themselves to competition? That is a question that should be considered.

Mr. KEATING. I do not think so. However, I commend the suggestion to the chairman of the committee and the conferees.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired. Is the amendment withdrawn?

Mr. KEATING. I will withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ALASKA OIL PROVISO.

SEC. 29. That any bona fide occupant or claimant of oil or gas bearing lands in the Territory of Alaska, or his successors or assigns, who prior to withdrawal had complied otherwise with the requirements of the mining laws, but had made no discovery of oil or gas in wells, and who prior to withdrawal had made substantial improvements on or for each location or had prior to the passage of this act expended not less than $500 in improvements on or for each location shall be entitled, upon relinquishment or surrender to the United States within one year from the date of this act or within six months after final denial or withdrawal of application for patent, to a prospecting permit or permits, lease or leases, under this act covering such lands, not exceeding five permits or leases in number and not exceeding an aggregate of 1,280 acres in each: Provided, That leases issued in Alaska under this act, whether as a result of prospecting permits or otherwise, shall be upon such rental and royalties as shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior and specified in the lease and be subject to readjustment at the end of each 10-year period of the lease: Provided further, That for the purpose of encouraging the production of petroleum products in Alaska the Secretary may, in his discretion, waive the payment of any rental or royalty not exceeding the first five years of any lease.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I suggest an amendment on page 34, line 16, to harmonize the provisions in that section with the provisions of the section on page 46, where there are granted not to exceed three leases to any one claimant in any one State.

Now, in order that this privilege of three leases may be availed of, I believe it ought to be made clear that not to exceed three prospecting permits in any one State should be granted. I believe that is a reasonable construction, and I believe it was the intent of the committee. Accordingly I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ELSTON: Page 34, line 16, after the word "permit," insert "not exceeding three in any one State or one within the geologic structure of a producing oil or gas field."

Mr. RAKER. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserve a point of order. That is the point.

Mr. ELSTON. The proposed amendment provides only that the Secretary of the Interior has the discretion to grant any number from one to three.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, consent has not been given to return to that section.

Mr. ELSTON. I thought that consent had been given. I assumed that was the effect of my colloquy with the gentleman some time back.

The CHAIRMAN. Consent has not been asked for.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we may return to page 34, line 16, for the purpose of offering my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to return to page 34, line 16, for the consideration of the amendment which he has submitted. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. ELSTON. This provides that not more than three prospecting permits shall be granted to any one claimant at one time in any State.

Mr. FERRIS. Let us have the amendment reported.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentlemen will subside for a moment, the Clerk will report the amendment. The Chair has already directed the Clerk to report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ELSTON: Page 34, line 16, after the word "permit," insert "not exceeding three in any one State or one within the geologic structure of a producing oil or gas field."

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I can consent to go back to that amendment. The gentleman may be right in stating that that was the intent of the committee, but I do not recall that the committee agreed to allow three permits to anyone in every State. I think you are doing more than the committee wanted to do and more than we ought to do.

Mr. ELSTON. I have some comments to make on that if I may have my five minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. Of course there is no five-minute privilege pending a request for unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent must first be obtained.

Mr. FERRIS. I will reserve my objection and let the gentleman have his time.

Mr. ELSTON. The only reason I suggested this amendment is to make it consistent with the provisions on page 46, by which not to exceed three leases may be granted in any one State. You can not get your lease without having had a prospecting permit theretofore, and I assume that there is not more than one lease granted under each prospecting permit. So, therefore, the implication of this language is that three prospecting permits may be in existence at the same time for each State.

You can not get away from the logic of that situation, and I assume that we ought to fill the privilege with regard to three leases by giving three prospecting permits to each State. If the gentleman is going to take another attitude on that, he might just as well go back to page 46 and reform the language.

Mr. FERRIS. There is nothing on page 46 that allows three permits in each State.

Mr. ELSTON. No; but it allows three leases in each State.

Mr. FERRIS. That is a very different thing.

Mr. ELSTON. How are you going to get three simultaneous leases to one man in one State without his having had three prospecting permits theretofore?

Mr. FERRIS. I think I can answer the gentleman. The prospecting permit is for 2,560 acres. When the prospector gets a lease he gets a lease on only one-fourth of it, or 640 acres. If he gets three leases out of the 2,560 acres—or if they were remnant tracts he might have three leases—in any event he can not go beyond the 2,560 acres.

Mr. ELSTON. I will say to the gentleman that I think that is sophistical. The gentleman knows very well that if you have one prospecting permit you will make one designation of what you want and put it up to the Secretary in one application, which will be disposed of in one lease.

Mr. FERRIS. That is 640 acres.

Mr. ELSTON. The gentleman's argument is that one prospecting permit will be used on three different occasions for three different leases. I can not accept the gentleman's argument in that respect. I think we had better go back to page 46 and make that language clear, because I am sure it was put in there in pursuance of the understanding that not to exceed three prospecting permits should be had in each State.

Mr. FERRIS. I am perfectly sure I never agreed in the committee to three prospecting permits in each of the States, and I am perfectly sure that the committee did not agree to three prospecing permits in each State. I feel I must object to returning now. Of course, if I am in error it can be corrected in conference. I think this too important to agree to it so hurriedly. I, of course, do not desire to do the gentleman from California any injustice by cutting him off.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to make an observation to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. FERRIS. I will reserve the objection for the purpose of allowing the gentleman to make his statement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I want to recall the gentleman's mind to the fact that we discussed this matter fully and agreed to three permits, and the proof of it is obvious right here in section 9. After we had discussed it and agreed on three prospecting permits we made a proviso that there should be five permits in Alaska. The gentleman from Alaska [Mr. SULZER], after we had agreed that there should be three permits in each State, asked for an exception for Alaska on account of the large area of country and the different conditions up there, and we put in a proviso as follows:

Provided, That in the Territory of Alaska prospecting permits not more than five in number shall be granted.

Mr. FERRIS. But wait a minute——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. We had already agreed on three within each State.

Mr. FERRIS. Five permits in the entire area of Alaska is a very different proposition from three permits in each of the States of the Union. The Elston amendment provides three for every State. I do not believe that ought to be done.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. We had already agreed on three for each State, and gave five to Alaska.

Mr. FERRIS. The amendment of the gentleman from California would give three permits for each State, or 3 times 48, if there happened to be public lands in that many States in the Union. This is not what the committee intended. I do not think it ought to be done. A few companies would get it all.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. For the present I feel it my duty to object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made, and the committee can not return to page 46.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: Page 54, line 10, strike out the word "ten" and insert the word "twenty" in lieu thereof. All the rest of the section of the bill provides for leasing for a 20-year period, and this will simply conform to the remainder of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SULZER: Page 54, line 10, after the word "each," strike out the word "ten" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty."

Mr. RAKER. Where does the gentleman get that? This is the readjustment period.

Mr. SULZER. We ought to have the same period in all the leases in the bill.

Mr. FERRIS. On the phosphate and oil we make it indeterminate, not exceeding 20 years, and each 10 years thereafter. Here we make it in the Alaskan provision 10 years. They are entitled to 20 years.

Mr. RAKER. If they are entitled to it, they ought to have it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alaska.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: On page 53, line 23, strike out the figures "500" and insert "250." That is only to conform with the amendment which was adopted a little while ago on page 52.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 53, line 23, after the word "than," to strike out the figures "500" and insert in lieu thereof "250."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that at the expiration of five minutes the debate on this section be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the proviso of section 28, if liberally construed, will afford a considerable amount of relief for locators of oil lands in the West—not as much relief as they are entitled to, because in many cases they should be given patents. I think that, at any rate, a larger leasehold than is proposed in this bill should be granted and hope the committee of conference will be disposed to modify these provisions as I have suggested. I hope the gentlemen who will be members of the conference committee will have this particular matter in mind in conference. Those who are entitled to the benefits of this section are those who had made locations prior to a withdrawal or prior to January 1, 1918. At the time the committee made their report it was thought proper to limit the benefits of this proviso to those who had made their locations before the 1st of January; but people in the public-land States are not all of them keeping track of what Congress is doing. They are going on locating and developing under the land laws all the time and there have been many bona fide locations made since the 1st of January. Where such locations otherwise come within the provisions of the section there is no reason why these people should not receive its benefit.

If there was any hope of further liberalizing the provisions of this section, I should certainly offer amendments to accomplish that purpose. It is very clear, however, that under prevailing conditions no amendment greatly modifying the section can be secured. In fact, it would not help the situation to attempt any important amendments.

Therefore I trust that in conference the provisions of this section will be made to apply to those who have made locations at any time up to the time of the passage of the bill rather than the 1st of January. With that amendment, the proviso as it has been amended on the floor will be very helpful to a great many locators. If it can be further liberalized so as to grant a patent under certain conditions, it will more nearly do justice by these locators.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill S. 2812 with a favorable recommendation, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DEWALT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 2812 to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. FERRIS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FERRIS. What happened in the committee is this: The committee struck out all of the Senate bill and put in the House bill as a substitute. I asked unanimous consent to substitute the House bill and have it considered as an original bill and amended section by section. Is the procedure now to move that the one amendment be agreed to which is a complete substitute?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman realizes that we had an understanding when the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; that the bill should be considered as an original House bill, and therefore if anybody demands a separate vote on any amendment it will be in order.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

There was no demand for a separate vote.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. FERRIS. Should not the motion be to adopt the amendment which is an entire substitute for the Senate bill 2812?

The SPEAKER. The question is on adopting the House bill with the various amendments as a substitute to the Senate bill.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the amended Senate bill.

The amended Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FERRIS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I desired to amend the title.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman from Michigan has a suggestion in regard to the title which I think a good one, and I ask unanimous consent that he be allowed to present it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to vacate the proceedings by which the bill was laid on the table. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have the title amended so as to read: "An act to authorize exploration for and disposition of coal, phosphate, oil and oil shales, or gas on the public domain."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be so amended.

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed and to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted to Mr. LARSEN for one week on account of attending the annual meeting of the board of trustees of the Georgia State Normal School.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, the majority leader [Mr. KITCHIN] has been called to the Senate, and he asked me to announce to the House that on Monday next the urgent deficiency appropriation bill will be called up, and that on Tuesday the Army appropriation bill will be taken up.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Was there not an understanding by unanimous consent that the pension bills would be called up on Monday?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I desire also to submit an inquiry, and that is whether the order which was entered by unanimous consent to consider pension bills would not make those pension bills in order on Monday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to think that it would.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is my impression that there was unanimous-consent agreement in respect to taking up the pension bills.

Mr. RUSSELL. There was a unanimous-consent agreement to take up the pension bills following the disposition of the oil bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk informs the Chair that the order was that the pension bills were to follow the disposition of the oil bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. And if we adjourn now those bills will be in order on Monday.

The SPEAKER. They would.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order that there is no quorum present.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 8764. An act to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the admission of the State of Illinois into the Union.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, May 27, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting an estimate of appropriation to pay the claim of the Brennan Construction Co. for balance due on the construction of the Senate Office Building under contract dated December 2, 1905 (H. Doc. No. 1132); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting substitute estimates of appropriation for the support of the Quartermaster Corps of the Army for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1133); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. SMITH of Idaho, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 935) for the relief of settlers on certain railroad lands in Montana, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 606), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. KAHN: A bill (H. R. 12258) to protect the military and naval forces of the United States against venereal diseases, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SHERLEY: A bill (H. R. 12280) making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes; to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

By Mr. DENT: A bill (H. R. 12281) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919; to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

By Mr. SHERLEY: A bill (H. R. 12282) designating the American mountain laurel the national flower of the United States; to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. HUSTED: A bill (H. R. 12283) exempting the compensation, pay, and emoluments of officers and enlisted men of the Army and Navy from the provisions of the income-tax law; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CROSSER: A bill (H. R. 12284) relating to liability of employers and assuring compensation for injuries or death of certain employees in the District of Columbia, providing for an industrial commission in said District and defining its duties, and providing for an appropriation to carry out the provisions of this act; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. DENT: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 294) providing for the time of application of the method of determining quotas of forces to be raised for military service as authorized in a joint resolution approved May 16, 1918; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. AUSTIN: A bill (H. R. 12285) granting a pension to David Gregg; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BOWERS: A bill (H. R. 12286) granting an increase of pension to John E. Hutzler; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12287) granting an increase of pension to William C. Clendening; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DYER: A bill (H. R. 12288) granting a pension to Frances H. Edgar Rice; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FIELDS: A bill (H. R. 12289) granting an increase of pension to Isaac E. Pearce; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky: A bill (H. R. 12290) granting an increase of pension to Henry P. Logsdon; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KAHN: A bill (H. R. 12291) granting a pension to George Cosseboom; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McKINLEY: A bill (H. R. 12292) granting a pension to George W. Robinson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PURNELL: A bill (H. R. 12293) granting a pension to Mary F. Conyers; to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. DOOLITTLE: Petition of the Congregational and Methodist Churches of Carbondale and of a mass meeting of the churches of Burlingame, Kans., favoring war-time prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. FOCHT: Memorial of the executive committee of the Real Estate Brokers' Association of Washington, D. C., asking that Congress make a fair investigation of the charges made against the real estate owners and agents of the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: Petition of the Chicago Daily Drovers' Journal, for the repeal of the zone system for second-class mail; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of William Castleman, editor of the Unionist, of Chicago, and of the Woman's Club of De Kalb, Ill., for prohibition as a war measure for the conservation of foods; to the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

By Mr. REED: Evidence to accompany House bill 12274, to increase the pension of John S. Brannon; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. STEELE: Petitions of residents of Pen Argyl and of Bethlehem, both in the State of Pennsylvania, for the amendment of the Constitution to prevent polygamy in the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

MONDAY, May 27, 1918.

Rev. J. L. Kibler, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

In the plentitude of Thy mercy, O Lord, look upon us as we come humbly into Thy presence. Surely we need Thee as never before. More and more do we realize the tremendous responsibility which rests upon us in the world conflict; and we tremble lest our sins rise up against us and be a reproach to our people. O Thou King of Kings, Thou God of mercy, blot out our transgressions, and incline Thine ear to our supplications. Help us to cling to Thy hand and to claim Thy power. Keep our motives pure, and strengthen our hands for the mighty struggle. Help us to seek that wisdom which is from above, and that righteousness which exalteth a nation; and may Thy kingdom come and over all nations prevail. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent on account of illness.

Mr. SHIELDS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. MCKELLAR] is detained on official business. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is detained by illness in his family. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. KIRBY. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is detained on official business. I wish also to announce that the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] is detained by illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2812) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to a concurrent resolution (45) providing that the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Monday, the 27th day of May, 1918, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, for the purpose of receiving such communication as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution (45) from the House of Representatives, which was read.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
May 27, 1918.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assembled in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Monday, the 27th day of May, 1918, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, for the purpose of receiving such communication as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate concur in the resolution just laid before the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have a petition from the Woman's Civic Club of Seattle asking for the passage of the Susan B. Anthony amendment submitting the question of suffrage to the various States without delay. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEATTLE, WASH., May 17, 1918.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate.

Whereas the women of our country are cordially responding to every call of our Government in its endeavor to conserve materials and have not hesitated to add to their duties so as to release all available man power for the Army and Navy; and

Whereas President Wilson believes that to grant woman suffrage at this time is a simple matter of justice to patriotic womanhood: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Woman's Civic Club of Seattle, Wash., in regular session assembled, That we urgently pray the United States Senate to pass the Susan B. Anthony amendment submitting the question of suffrage to the various States without delay, thereby assuring all women that democracy is as surely for them as for their brothers, thus enabling suffragists to give their undivided attention to war work; and be it

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to President Wilson, to Vice President Marshall, and to Senators MARTIN, GALLINGER, BORAH, JONES of Washington, and POINDEXTER.

Representing 100,000 women voters.

Mrs. CORNELIUS G. RUNTE,
Corresponding Secretary.

Mr. JONES of Washington presented a petition of McKinley Grange, No. 596, Patrons of Husbandry, of Toppenish, Wash., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for the leasing of Indian reservation lands only to persons, citizens, or intending citizens of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the President of the Spokane & Eastern Trust Co., of Spokane, Wash., and a memorial of the Tacoma Savings Bank & Trust Co., of Tacoma, Wash., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation granting to national banks such authority and power that the several States have not granted, which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a telegram in the form of a petition from the local branch, Ohio Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Columbus, Ohio, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McLEAN. I have received a large number of telegrams containing resolutions favoring the adoption of the Susan B. Anthony amendment. They are so numerous that I do not feel like asking to have them printed in the RECORD, for I believe that is as unwise as it is unnecessary, but I ask unanimous consent that one of them be printed in the RECORD, as it is a fair sample of the very large number which I have received.

There being no objection, one of the telegrams was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW HAVEN, CONN., May 27, 1918.

G. P. MCLEAN,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Whereas there is tremendous increase in the favorable sentiment toward woman suffrage in this country and widespread recognition of equal suffrage as a war measure; and

Whereas the delay and opposition of the Federal suffrage amendment by undemocratic Members in the Senate is creating a country-wide condemnation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the political workers of the third congressional district of Connecticut, in a meeting called for this purpose, do hereby protest at the deferred action and do earnestly request the Senate to pass the Susan B. Anthony amendment at the earliest possible date, and we also request that this resolution be written into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

HANNAH D. TOWNSHEND, Chairman.
GLADYS BRAGDON, Secretary.

Mr. McLEAN presented petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Connecticut, praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the State Medical Society of Connecticut, praying for the enactment of legislation to provide advanced rank for officers of the Medical Corps of the Army, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. NELSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Minnesota, praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Minnesota, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COLT presented a petition of the Society of the Mayflower Descendants of the State of Rhode Island, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Bankers' Association of the State of Rhode Island, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to guarantee bank deposits under $5,000, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. HARDING. I present a communication from the Farmers' Telephone Co., of Sidney, Ohio, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FARMERS' TELEPHONE CO.,
Sidney, Ohio, May 21, 1918.

Hon. WARREN G. HARDING,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Our company, operating in Shelby County, has in operation over 1,300 telephones serving the men who are producing the food to win the war and who are buying the liberty bonds, war-savings stamps, etc., to finance it, and who are sending their sons to the defense of their country, is being discriminated against by the Bell Telephone Co. and its allied interests as common carriers by being denied the privilege of long-distance telephone connection.

We as a people believe in democracy and pledge our all to its cause; we declare for equal rights to all and special privilege to none. We have sought relief through the legislature and was denied our rights through political connivance by the manipulations of special interests. We therefore respectfully request your earnest cooperation in behalf of relief of this and similar situation. We further request that this communication be read into the records and placed in the hands of the proper committee.

Very truly, yours,
C. C. HERMETET,
Secretary and General Manager.

LOUIS E. MARRS, President.
N. J. MOORE, Secretary.

SALARIES OF CLERKS OF DISTRICT COURTS.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 3079) fixing the salary of the clerks of the United States district courts; prescribing how and when they shall account for the fees collected; providing for the office expenses of such clerks, including salaries of deputy clerks and clerical assistants; and for the travel and subsistence expense of such clerks and their deputies when necessarily absent from their official residences, reported it with an amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. NUGENT:

A bill (S. 4626) providing for a survey of certain unsurveyed lands within the Crow Indian Reservation, Mont., and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

MINING ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2812) to encourage and promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

Mr. PITTMAN. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. PHELAN, Mr. SHAFROTH, Mr. SMOOT, and Mr. FALL conferees on the part of the Senate.

DISTRICT RENT ADMINISTRATOR—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I submitted a few days ago the conference report on Senate joint resolution 152, and I move that it be taken up.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 152) to prevent rent profiteering in the District of Columbia having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, and 28, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed by the House insert the following: "a treaty of peace shall have been definitely concluded between the United States and the Imperial German Government, or until provided by Congress," and in line 3 of the engrossed bill, after the word "until," strike out "the"; and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 1, line 6, of the engrossed bill, after "agreement," strike out the words "or written"; and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 2, line 16, of the engrossed bill, after the word "agreement" strike out "or written"; and the House agree to the same.

WILLARD SAULSBURY,
ATLEE POMERENE,
LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
BEN JOHNSON,
ROBERT CROSSER,
WILLIAM J. CARY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move the immediate consideration of the conference report.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear the request of the Senator from Delaware.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware moved the consideration of the conference report. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. SMOOT. That can not be done without unanimous consent. It is not yet 1 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule is that when presented the question shall be immediately put and that it shall be decided without debate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Rule XXVII provides for just this condition. I fancy that the conference report can be agreed to in a few minutes. It is, of course, in order under the rule. The rule is very strict that the question of consideration shall be settled without debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware to proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think there are some Senators concerned about this matter who are not present. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Possibly the Senator from Florida was not in the Chamber when the roll was called. I raise the question as to whether the call for a quorum is in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Business has been transacted since the former call.

Mr. FLETCHER. I withdraw the call for a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware to proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words in regard to the report. Apparently about the only change submitted by the conferees is adding the words "unless in the meantime otherwise provided by Congress," and limiting the time to the close of the war instead of one year thereafter. The language would be "that until the close of the present war between the United States and the Imperial German Government, unless in the meantime otherwise provided by Congress," no recovery of possession of premises can be had. It is limited to the period of the war "unless in the meantime otherwise provided by Congress." Of course, that language really does not mean anything, because Congress can at any time change any law it may have previously passed. If the joint resolution was passed without that provision in it, it would not be binding except so long as Congress might not change it. This clause, it seems to me, is without any real effect or meaning.

The situation is simply this, and I feel this way about it, putting myself in the position of a landlord in the District of Columbia for the moment, and it seems to me fair for us in considering a matter of this sort to apply the case to ourselves as to both sides, as to the landlord and as to the tenant. Putting myself, as I said, in the position of a landlord for the moment, a landlord who wants to do his whole duty by the Government, who is patriotic, I would say, if I were a landlord and the Government wanted my property, if the Government needed my property, I stand absolutely ready on the minute to deed it to the Government. I would not have the slightest hesitation about it. If I was satisfied the Government required my property for the purposes of the war, the Government could take it without a moment's delay, with my prompt, free, and full consent, and I believe this is the sentiment, practically unanimous, of the property owners of this District.

On the other hand, if the Government desires to take possession of my property for the benefit of some people who would like to enjoy it and deprive me of its possession and its control not for the benefit of the Government, but for the benefit of some people who may be occupying it for the present, who are in no wise connected with any activity of the Government, I say that is simply inexcusable tyranny; it is rank and wanton despotism; it is oppression of the meanest kind, in my judgment.

There are a number of people in the city of Washington who are here because Washington is the center of things, not because they are doing any work for the Government, not because they are serving the country. They are here to enjoy the society of Washington, to enjoy the privileges of Washington for their own benefit, not because they are needed here, not because they are wanted here, not because they are doing any work here for the Government. People of that class, to whom a landlord in this District may have rented an apartment last October, for instance, or a residence, will be in a position under this joint resolution to say that they propose to continue to occupy that apartment or that residence until the war is ended, no matter how long that may be. Congress proposes to put it in the power of those tenants in that relation to the Government, who are not only not serving the Government themselves, but are occupying premises that ought to be occupied by war workers, and the landlord is made powerless to get rid of them or to make available those premises for the use of those who are at work for the Government. There are people here who ought not to be here, have no business here, occupying premises, and you undertake to say these people may continue to occupy those premises indefinitely, no matter what contract they may have solemnly made with the lessor as to the termination of such lease.

Instead of the joint resolution operating for the advantage and benefit of those who are here serving the Government, at work in any of the departments, it will operate just the other way. It will deprive those people of the advantages which they might have were landlords in different cases permitted to carry out the terms of the solemn contract entered into with the tenant. A tenant, for instance, leased an apartment or a residence last October under a lease which provides that it shall expire on the 1st of the coming October. Congress proposes to say, notwithstanding that solemn contract entered into between the landlord and the tenant terminating that lease on the 1st of October, it shall remain in force and effect until the end of the war. It is a monstrous proposition, helpful to nobody except the people who are actually occupying the premises; and, as my correspondence will show and my information from reliable sources supports, those people, in a great number of instances, are here simply because they like to be in Washington and are in nowise engaged in any work or any undertaking that is helpful to the Government; people, for instance, who have sons in the departments, they like to be near, for their own pleasure, who are here in disregard of the public interest. You propose to take property for their benefit, not for any public purpose. The Congress has no constitutional power to authorize the taking of property for other than public use, and then only upon just compensation.

Mr. President, take this sort of a case: The owner of a residence in this city of Washington on the 1st of last October, for instance, may have rented a portion of that residence to a tenant; that lease expires next October. The tenant may not have violated, and may not violate, any of the terms of that lease; he may pay the rent; he may not have committed any tort or, wrong that under the terms of the lease would make it possible for the landlord to dispossess him. If this resolution passes, the owner of that property would be utterly unable to resume possession of his own residence after the expiration of that lease by its express terms.

Suppose the landlord decides that he himself wants to use his own property and does not care to rent any portion of it beyond next October. He reaches that conclusion; it is his property; he desires to possess it. His tenant, who is occupying it, is not engaged in any war work; he is not concerned in any endeavor here by way of supporting the Government, but is simply enjoying the society of Washington. Under this joint resolution the owner of the property is unable to get possession of his own residence, or that portion of it which he may have rented, notwithstanding the contract, under seal, witnessed, and all that, solemnly made, that on the 1st of next October the tenant would cease to be an occupant of those premises. Congress proposes to say that the owner of the residence himself shall not be privileged to stand upon the terms of his contract with the tenant and to occupy his own property. I say, Mr. President, that I do not believe any court in the country will sustain such a law, or that it ought to be sustained.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Assuming that the lease was made last October and expires on the 1st of next October, and the premises are occupied by a tenant, could the landlord or his own family, having been temporarily out of possession, occupy it themselves instead of the tenant, or would they be compelled to let it go?

Mr. FLETCHER. That tenant could pay the rent and the landlord could not get possession of his own premises under this joint resolution. That is the situation in which this resolution leaves the community and leaves the owners of property.

I submit that it is not a war measure. It does not help in this situation from any standpoint whatsoever. The only person it would help would be the person who has a present lease on premises in the District of Columbia, and it is not mutual as to that person. There is nothing fair about it from that standpoint. If the joint resolution went on to provide that if the tenant desired to end the lease he should not be allowed to do so, but must go on and pay the rent; as it does provide, on the other hand, that the landlord can not insist on his rights under the lease, but must accept the rent from the tenant and allow the tenant to occupy his premises until the end of the war, there might be something somewhat mutual in that sort of an arrangement; but here the tenant is under no obligation to continue in the possession of the property; he simply has the right to do it, and the landlord is deprived of any sort of process by which he can acquire possession of his own property.

It was utterly impossible for a landlord in this community to have foreseen last October that this sort of a situation might arise, whereby the Government would step in and say: "Notwithstanding you only intended and contracted to lease your premises for a fixed term, that term we hereby extend for an indefinite period." The landlord could not have foreseen that condition. Is it fair or just to impose it upon him in these circumstances, when the effect of the resolution, as I have said, in the great majority of cases is in no wise to help those who are doing work for the Government?

We have recently passed a law to provide for the erection of barracks and buildings for the accommodation of war workers in the District of Columbia; they will be taken care of under that law; provisions will be made for them in such a way that it will be impossible to impose upon them.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I again interrupt the Senator from Florida?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator from Florida answered me a while ago, when I put the case to him of a landlord himself desiring to occupy the premises, after the termination of the lease. Does the Senator understand that, even where the landlord himself was connected with the Government—a Member of Congress, for instance, or any other individual connected with the Government, if that individual happens to be connected with the Government in any way—would he not be entitled to the possession of the premises at the end of the lease if he himself wanted to occupy them?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is possible in that situation under a provision of the joint resolution, that, if "the premises are necessarily required by a landlord or bona fide purchaser for occupation either by himself or his wife, children, or dependents while he is in the employ of or officially connected with any branch of the Government," he may get possession of the property if he can show that his premises are necessarily required by him for his own occupation, either by himself, wife, children, or dependents, or he himself is in the employ or officially connected with a branch of the Government. I believe under the joint resolution in such a case he would be entitled to institute proceedings and recover possession. Of course, there are landlords in the District of Columbia who are not in the employ of the Government, and who are not officially connected with any branch of the Government. A vast majority of the landlords no doubt occupy that position.

Mr. SAULSBURY. May I ask the Senator from Florida a question?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Does the Senator think it is such a horrible condition of affairs where a man has not been occupying his house, as in the case stated by him, for the period of a year past, that he can come into the District again, and add to the lack of housing by insisting on taking a house back which he had already rented and of which other people have been in possession? Of course, the Senator understands that the theory is that we are endeavoring to provide against a present condition; and if a man has rented his property for a year, has let somebody else have it, why should he be particularly tenderly dealt with when he comes back and adds to the general demand for houses?

Mr. FLETCHER. It may be that an owner of the property may have business in Washington which calls him back. It is entirely reasonable to assume that, as he is the owner of the property, having his home in Washington, and that he built the property in order that he might have a home, and he has some sort of right to come to his own home. It seems as though there might be a case of that sort, that a man has built a home for himself; he is temporarily away, and sees fit to rent it, or to rent a part of it even, to some one else, that lease expires on the 1st of October, we will say, and he then desires to and conceives the notion that he has a right to occupy his own home. It may be that he has some such right as that, absurd as it appears to the movers of this resolution.

I know that the effort is to reach profiteers; I am in hearty sympathy with that; I am in full accord with that. I believe every individual who has been guilty by exorbitant rent charges and that sort of thing of imposing upon the people resident in the District of Columbia and those who have come here, ought to be reached and ought to be dealt with in some adequate way; but this resolution does not accomplish anything of the kind in my judgment.

It is admitted here that most of the profiteering arises by reason of subletting. I know the answer to that is that the landlord under the usual form of lease has the right to object to subletting or, in other words, that the tenant can not sublet without the consent of the landlord; but suppose that last October a landlord rented an apartment or a residence to an individual, and that individual subsequently came to the landlord and said, "I desire to sublet these premises," giving some good reason, as he undoubtedly could in most instances; "the person to whom I desire to sublet is an entirely respectable person, in good standing," and all that sort of thing, and the landlord, in an accommodating spirit, consented that that subletting might be made to the end of that lease. Now, Congress proposes to step in and say that that landlord can not withdraw that consent; he is to be bound to the end of the war to that consent. He only consented that the subletting might go on until the end of the lease; but it is proposed now that the tenant shall remain in possession of the property until the end of the war; the consent to sublet it is binding upon the tenant so long as the lease is binding upon the landlord, and there you are perpetuating an iniquity which you wished to stop. You propose to continue, you absolutely oblige a continuation of that relation between the tenant and the sublessee. I say that is unfair. And, furthermore, it defeats your object. Even if the landlord did consent to the subletting originally, it was for a limited time; and the consent never would have been given most likely if it had been understood that the lease was not to end in accordance with its terms. Congress proposes to step in and say that the lease shall continue indefinitely, to the end of the war, and that means that the tenant can go on with his subletting as he has done before. I say you do not by such legislation reach the situation which you are aiming at.

Mr. President, if it were a case, as I have said, of the landlord imposing upon people engaged in helping the Government in any way in this emergency, I would stand ready to cooperate with anyone in that direction; but in the instance mentioned by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], the cases where persons are occupying premises who are not war workers and are not engaged in helping the Government. If this joint resolution were limited, if it could be limited, to cases of tenants who are serving the Government, I would not have the slightest objection to it, even if it did continue until the end of the war. It ought not to continue beyond the enactment of a bill such as that offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and which has passed the Senate, but it is perfectly well known that that bill meets with opposition in the other body, and it is very doubtful if that legislation will ever be written upon the statute books. This is probably the only legislation that will be enacted upon this subject, and we must consider it from that standpoint.

If this joint resolution were limited to the end of this session of Congress, I would have no objection to it; if it were limited to cases where tenants occupying premises are engaged in work for the Government or employed by the Government, I would have no objection to it; but it is not limited in either respect. It covers all cases of people residing in Washington, not merely those at work for the Government, but those who are here because they like to be here, because, for instance, their relatives may be in the Army or Navy or in some office connected with the departments, and the mothers and sisters are here visiting them, or because they enjoy the society of Washington. Those are people you are taking care of under this joint resolution. If the joint resolution were confined to a prohibition regarding the disturbing of people who are serving the Government and employed by the Government, I should say, "Let it pass"; if it were confined to a definite period of time, if it were limited to this session of Congress, so that we might have fuller and more complete legislation on this subject, such as the Pomerene bill, I should say, "Let is pass"; but the prospect is that this is the only measure on this subject that will be enacted by Congress, and it does not accomplish what it was desired or intended to accomplish. It imposes unheard-of hardship and even confiscation upon property owners of this city; and, in my judgment, the conference report ought not to be agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have heretofore taken a little of the time of the Senate on this subject. I wish to say a final word by way of protest against the enactment of this character of legislation. Without hesitation, I declare that such a piece of legislation has never disfigured the statute books of a free country.

So far as the Washington profiteer is concerned, everybody believes that he is a disgrace to the city in which he lives. A man who has doubled his rent and then perhaps doubled it again is doing his city a disservice and is entitled to the contempt of all decent men. There ought to be a law passed that will reach him. Such a law can be passed without doing violence to the Constitution, for I have no doubt that in the District of Columbia Congress possesses a power of levying taxes which could be so employed as to take away entirely the profits of men who have charged excessive rents. If we could proceed in accordance with the Constitution, reaching these excessive rents in that way, I would be as willing to proceed along that line as any other man in this body; but, disguise it as we may, we are undertaking here to abolish rights of property. I said a few days ago, and I venture to repeat, that the Soviet of Russia has attempted nothing more radical, nothing that more completely outrages the fundamental principles that must be in the very warp and woof and soul of free governments than does this joint resolution.

Let us see what you propose to do. You propose to say that a man who has bought a piece of property and who has paid for it, and who has leased that property for one month or a longer period, can not recover possession of that property so long as the tenant agrees to pay rent, until this war shall end? This war may not end for 10 years, but whether it shall last for 10 years or 10 months the principle is the same. You propose not only to violate the terms of contracts, but you propose to make new contracts for people—contracts that they never made in the world.

You had a house, and you rented it for 35 days, expecting at the end of the 35 days to resume possession of it, and along comes—what shall I say, the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States, or shall I say an aggregation of men who disregard the Constitution under which they pretend to assemble?—and these men say: "Notwithstanding the fact that this is your house, bought and paid for with your money, and leased for a limited period of 35 days, we hereby extend that lease, and make a new contract for you that may last for 10 years."

I defy any man in this Chamber to point to anything that has been done by that aggregation of insanity and imbecility and anarchy known as the Russian Soviet that goes further than this joint resolution; and I pause to have it pointed out. I challenge the authors of this joint resolution to point out the thing that has been done by that body relating to rights of property that goes further than this joint resolution goes. I am pausing for the reply. I am issuing the challenge to men who sit silent, whose tongues cleave to the roofs of their mouths.

Let me read a part of the joint resolution as it now comes back:

That until a treaty of peace shall have been definitely concluded between the United States and the Imperial German Government, unless in the meantime otherwise provided by Congress, no judicial order, decree, or judgment for the recovery of possession of any real estate in the District of Columbia, now or hereafter held or acquired by oral or written agreement of lease for one month or any longer period, or for the ejectment or dispossession of a tenant therefrom, shall be made, and all leases thereof shall continue so long as the tenant continues to pay rent at the agreed rate and performs the other conditions of the tenancy which are not inconsistent herewith.

Let me take my illustration and follow it. You own a house. You leased it for 35 days. You agreed to yield possession of that house for that 35 days and no longer, and to receive your pay for it. You intended at the end of that period to resume possession. You leased it to some individual, perhaps, who is here in town out of curiosity, an idler. You desire to lease it to a man engaged in the performance of responsible duties for the Government. Under those circumstances you find Members of the Senate deliberately devising a plan by which you will be denied any day in court, any chance in court, any opportunity in court, until this war shall end, to get possession of your property.

Senators think that they have arrived at some astute means of defeating the Constitution by saying that "we have only effected the remedy." Is it the business of Members of the Senate to devise means to cheat the Constitution, some shrewd and keen lawyerlike scheme so cunning that it will evade the plain terms of the Constitution? Let me say to the authors of this joint resolution that they have not succeeded, because the courts of law have in the past always said that while the remedy may be changed it can not be so changed as to be a denial of a remedy.

Think of the monstrous idea! You rented a house for 35 days. You may have rented it at half its value, and you may have rented it merely to have an occupant in it so that it would not be a vacant place, and the insurance would not be canceled. But now along come the authors of this joint resolution, and they propose that that rent shall continue for all time until the war is over. God knows when it will be. We hope and pray it will not be long; but I do not believe there is a thoroughly posted man connected with this Government, a man who has gone down to the bottom and root of things, who believes that this war will end within a very short period of time. For my own part, I look for three years at least of the fearful struggle. I could give you the reasons, and I shall in a day or two, if I have the privilege of addressing the Senate upon the war.

Follow a little further. There are some exceptions made to this. Some of these exceptions might cover the particular illustration I used, but they will not cover the general rights of property. Then we follow on. The provision is that where there has been an order, decree, or judgment—

Made but not executed before the passage of this resolution, the court by which the order, decree, or judgment was made shall, if it is of the opinion that the order, decree, or judgment would not have been made if this resolution had been in force at the date of the making of the order, decree, or judgment, rescind or modify the order, decree, or judgment in such manner as the court may deem proper for the purpose of giving effect to this resolution.

Now, let us stop and analyze that a little bit. We have a provision in the Constitution against ex post facto laws that I am aware has been construed as applied to criminal acts; but here is a provision for a court to render a decree such as it would have done if a law had been in existence that was not in existence when the decree was written. If that is not giving an ex post facto effect to a law, then, in the name of common sense, what is it?

Through the experience of the ages we have learned that one of the chief instruments of tyranny was to pass a law that would have a retroactive effect, a law that would affect the rights of human beings as they existed before the law had been enacted, a law that reached into the past and undid something that had been done, and properly done, and legally done, under the law as it then existed. This infamous measure, this measure that insults the intelligence of every lover of liberty in the world, proposes to say that a court having once rendered a decree—no matter though the term of court may have expired, and no matter though the question may no longer be in the bosom of the court—may render the decree now which it would have rendered if the law now in existence had been in existence at the time the decree was rendered. Is it not a shame to pass a law like that? Is it not a disgrace to pass a law like that? Is it not an absurdity to pass a law like that?

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must ask the Senator from Missouri to reserve further remarks until later. The hour having arrived at which, in accordance with the concurrent resolution of the two Houses, the Senate is to proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives, there to listen to a communication of the President of the United States, the Sergeant at Arms will take charge of the proceedings.

Thereupon the Senate, preceded by its Sergeant at Arms, and headed by the Vice President and the Secretary, proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

At 1 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m. the Senate returned to its Chamber, and the Vice President resumed the chair.

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The address of the President of the United States this day delivered at a joint meeting of the two Houses of Congress is as follows:

GENTLEMEN OF THE CONGRESS: It is with unaffected reluctance that I come to ask you to prolong your session long enough to provide more adequate resources for the Treasury for the conduct of the war. I have reason to appreciate as fully as you do how arduous the session has been. Your labours have been severe and protracted. You have passed a long series of measures which required the debate of many doubtful questions of judgment and many exceedingly difficult questions of principle as well as of practice. The summer is upon us in which labour and counsel are twice arduous and are constantly apt to be impaired by lassitude and fatigue. The elections are at hand and we ought as soon as possible to go and render an intimate account of our trusteeship to the people who delegated us to act for them in the weighty and anxious matters that crowd upon us in these days of critical choice and action. But we dare not go to the elections until we have done our duty to the full. These are days when duty stands stark and naked and even with closed eyes we know it is there. Excuses are unavailing. We have either done our duty or we have not. The fact will be as gross and plain as the duty itself. In such a case lassitude and fatigue seem negligible enough. The facts are tonic and suffice to freshen the labour.

And the facts are these: Additional revenues must manifestly be provided for. It would be a most unsound policy to raise too large a proportion of them by loan, and it is evident that the four billions now provided for by taxation will not of themselves sustain the greatly enlarged budget to which we must immediately look forward. We cannot in fairness wait until the end of the fiscal year is at hand to apprise our people of the taxes they must pay on their earnings of the present calendar year, whose accountings and expenditures will then be closed. We can not get increased taxes unless the country knows what they are to be and practices the necessary economy to make them available. Definiteness, early definiteness, as to what its tasks are to be is absolutely necessary for the successful administration of the Treasury; it cannot frame fair and workable regulations in haste; and it must frame its regulations in haste if it is not to know its exact task until the very eve of its performance. The present tax laws are marred, moreover, by inequities which ought to be remedied. Indisputable facts, every one; and we cannot alter or blink them. To state them is argument enough.

And yet perhaps you will permit me to dwell for a moment upon the situation they disclose. Enormous loans freely spent in the stimulation of industry of almost every sort produce inflations and extravagances which presently make the whole economic structure questionable and insecure and the very basis of credit is cut away. Only fair, equitably distributed taxation, of the widest incidence and drawing chiefly from the sources which would be likely to demoralize credit by their very abundance, can prevent inflation and keep our industrial system free of speculation and waste. We shall naturally turn, therefore, I suppose, to war profits and incomes and luxuries for the additional taxes. But the war profits and incomes upon which the increased taxes will be levied will be the profits and incomes of the calendar year 1918. It would be manifestly unfair to wait until the early months of 1919 to say what they are to be. It might be difficult, I should imagine, to run the mill with water that had already gone over the wheel.

Moreover, taxes of that sort will not be paid until the June of next year, and the Treasury must anticipate them. It must use the money they are to produce before it is due. It must sell short-time certificates of indebtedness. In the autumn a much larger sale of long-time bonds must be effected than has yet been attempted. What are the bankers to think of the certificates if they do not certainly know where the money is to come from which is to take them up? And how are investors to approach the purchase of bonds with any sort of confidence or knowledge of their own affairs if they do not know what taxes they are to pay and what economies and adjustments of their business they must effect? I cannot assure the country of a successful administration of the Treasury in 1918 if the question of further taxation is to be left undecided until 1919.

The consideration that dominates every other now, and makes every other seem trivial and negligible, is the winning of the war. We are not only in the midst of the war, we are at the very peak and crisis of it. Hundreds of thousands of our men, carrying our hearts with them and our fortunes, are in the field, and ships are crowding faster and faster to the ports of France and England with regiment after regiment, thousand after thousand, to join them until the enemy shall be beaten and brought to a reckoning with mankind. There can be no pause or intermission. The great enterprise must, on the contrary, be pushed with greater and greater energy. The volume of our might must steadily and rapidly be augmented until there can be no question of resisting it. If that is to be accomplished, gentlemen, money must sustain it to the utmost. Our financial programme must no more be left in doubt or suffered to lag than our ordnance programme or our ship programme or our munitions programme or our programme for making millions of men ready. These others are not programmes, indeed, but mere plans upon paper, unless there is to be an unquestionable supply of money.

That is the situation, and it is the situation which creates the duty, no choice or preference of ours. There is only one way to meet that duty. We must meet it without selfishness or fear of consequences. Politics is adjourned. The elections will go to those who think least of it; to those who go to the constituencies without explanations or excuses, with a plain record of duty faithfully and disinterestedly performed. I, for one, am always confident that the people of this country will give a just verdict upon the service of the men who act for them when the facts are such that no man can disguise or conceal them. There is no danger of deceit now. An intense and pitiless light beats upon every man and every action in this tragic plot of war that is now upon the stage. If lobbyists hurry to Washington to attempt to turn what you do in the matter of taxation to their protection or advantage, the light will beat also upon them. There is abundant fuel for the light in the records of the Treasury with regard to profits of every sort. The profiteering that can not be got at by the restraints of conscience and love of country can be got at by taxation. There is such profiteering now and the information with regard to it is available and indisputable.

I am advising you to act upon this matter of taxation now, gentlemen, not because I do not know that you can see and interpret the facts and the duty they impose just as well and with as clear a perception of the obligations involved as I can, but because there is a certain solemn satisfaction in sharing with you the responsibilities of such a time. The world never stood in such case before. Men never before had so clear or so moving a vision of duty. I know that you will begrudge the work to be done here by us no more than the men begrudge us theirs who lie in the trenches and sally forth to their death. There is a stimulating comradeship knitting us all together. And this task to which I invite your immediate consideration will be performed under favourable influences if we will look to what the country is thinking and expecting and care nothing at all for what is being said and believed in the lobbies of Washington hotels, where the atmosphere seems to make it possible to believe what is believed nowhere else.

Have you not felt the spirit of the nation rise and its thought become a single and common thought since these eventful days came in which we have been sending our boys to the other side? I think you must read that thought, as I do, to mean this, that the people of this country are not only united in the resolute purpose to win this war but are ready and willing to bear any burden and undergo any sacrifice that it may be necessary for them to bear in order to win it. We need not be afraid to tax them, if we lay taxes justly. They know that the war must be paid for and that it is they who must pay for it, and if the burden is justly distributed and the sacrifice made a common sacrifice from which none escapes who can bear it at all, they will carry it cheerfully and with a sort of solemn pride. I have always been proud to be an American, and was never more proud than now, when all that we have said and all that we have foreseen about our people is coming true. The great days have come when the only thing that they ask for or admire is duty greatly and adequately done; when their only wish for America is that she may share the freedom she enjoys; when a great, compelling sympathy wells up in their hearts for men everywhere who suffer and are oppressed; and when they see at last the high uses for which their wealth has been piled up and their mighty power accumulated and, counting neither blood nor treasure now that their final day of opportunity has come, rejoice to spend and to be spent through a long night of suffering and terror in order that they and men everywhere may see the dawn of a day of righteousness and justice and peace. Shall we grow weary when they bid us act?

May I add this word, gentlemen? Just as I was leaving the White House I was told that the expected drive on the western front had apparently begun. You can realize how that solemnized my feeling as I came to you, and how it seemed to strengthen the purpose which I have tried to express in these lines.

I have admired the work of this session. The way in which the two Houses of the Congress have cooperated with the Executive has been generous and admirable, and it is not in any spirit of suggesting duty neglected, but only to remind you of the common cause and the common obligation that I have ventured to come to you to-day.

DISTRICT RENT ADMINISTRATOR—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 152) to prevent rent profiteering in the District of Columbia.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire for a few moments to resume my remarks. I call attention to another clause in this remarkable joint resolution, and I ask if such a provision as this was ever written into a law before—> and all remedies, at law or in equity, of the lessor based on any provision in any oral or written agreement of lease that the same shall be determined or forfeited if the premises shall be sold are hereby suspended while this resolution shall be in force, and every purchaser shall take the conveyance of any premises subject to the rights of all tenants in possession thereof under the provisions of this resolution.

So that if a man has obtained a lease upon a piece of property with the express understanding that if the owner desires to sell that property the lease will be terminated, he now finds himself in the position that Congress has annulled and destroyed that provision, and even though he sell his property he can not acquire possession of it! If that be not the destruction of property rights, then property rights can not be destroyed. It is not a law merely affecting a remedy; it is a law denying a remedy, and a law denying a remedy where property rights are involved in itself is a denial of property rights.

Mr. President, we may discuss these questions to the empty benches of the Senate, but I say to the Senate we shall with very poor grace prosecute a man for denouncing the Constitution of the United States, as we have provided under the espionage act he may be prosecuted, if we, at the same time, sitting in this high place, ourselves ravish the Constitution and do it without a pretense of justification.

I repeat in part what I said a few days ago, lest some Senator may not have had his mind directed to the particular thought. The day is coming when there will be hardships in this land, when there will be suffering, and when all those turbulent elements of society who seek in the face of suffering to accomplish remedies by a disregard of law and disregard of constitutions, will be possibly in the ascendency numerically in this country; there will come a day after this war is over when privation and want will be not uncommon strangers in the cities and hamlets of our country. When that time does come, and come it will, there will come also the doctrinaire who preaches that property should be divided, that property rights should not any longer be regarded, and when that man comes and tells us that the hour has struck when, in order to alleviate human suffering, we must disregard the Constitution; he will point to the record made by the Senate to-day, a record that disregards property rights for reasons that are trivial. The day will come when more extreme individuals will insist that the decrees of courts should not be regarded, and when that day does come the soap-box anarchist who announces that doctrine under a red flag can point to the action of the United States Senate taken with reference to the mere matter of rent profiteering in the city of Washington. The day will come when some wretch, when perhaps many wretches, will desire to pass laws, retroactive in their nature, affecting the property of individuals and destroying rights that have already accrued and that have already been fully recognized, and when this enemy of law and order and of civilization makes his plea he can point to the action of the United States Senate solemnly declaring that the solemn judgments of courts can be set aside and a new judgment rendered in accordance with a law that did not exist when the original judgment was entered.

I may stand here now and say this to empty benches and to men who are afflicted with a sort of madness that I can not understand; but the day will come when the lovers of liberty will charge us with having sown the dragon's teeth from which an army of anarchists have sprung up. The day will come when those who would do violence to law, to constitutions, and to civilization will plant themselves upon the ground you to-day occupy, and from that ground they will defy you in the name of this precedent, they will sanctify the villainy of their hearts and the evil purposes of their counsels.

The President has not asked you to do this. So often men undertake to sanctify their acts under the claim that the President has asked it. One law was proposed here that sought to strike down the civil tribunals of our country, and the President denounced it because it violated the Constitution and in bitter language declared that it would be worthy of Prussia. That was a law that denied the civil courts in criminal cases their just jurisdiction. This is a law that denies the civil courts in civil cases their just jurisdiction. If you tell me that it applies only to the District of Columbia, I answer: If the Congress of the United States, being the supreme legislative body of the District of Columbia, shall violate the Constitution that every Member of Congress swore he would uphold, then what shall you expect from the legislatures of States? And if we violate the Constitution, what shall you expect from the ignorant, from the unlettered, from the men who come here from foreign countries? If we write into our laws the infamous and damnable doctrine that a court can set aside its judgment that was passed under a state of laws that existed, and can now revise that judgment and enter a decree in accordance with the law that we are about to pass now—if we do that, then I say that we have written across the face of liberty the word "dishonor."

The President does not ask it. He tells you that there is profiteering in this land, but he does not tell you to ravish the Constitution. In his message just delivered, the way is suggested. It is a way that has already been discussed upon this floor. Let me read it to you:

> The profiteering that can not be got at by the restraints of conscience and love of country can be got at by taxation.

That is a legal way to get at it. That is a constitutional way to get at it. Why do not the authors of this measure pursue that course? If there are men in the city of Washington who are raising their rent two or three times beyond what is fair and reasonable, let a simple tax provision be drawn that will be so heavy that the profiteer will find that all his profits are carried into the Federal Treasury, and he will cease robbing tenants, for it will put no money in his purse.

I read again what the President says:

> The profiteering that can not be got at by the restraints of conscience and love of country can be got at by taxation.

We have been told that this joint resolution is only temporary; that while by its terms it lasts until the end of the war, a law is to be passed that will reach this question from another angle. Mr. President, I think that law will never see the light of day, once this joint resolution is passed, until in the due course of time some judge shall disregard popular clamor, some judge shall turn his back upon those who would pursue their way, even though they do it over the broken pillars of the temple of law and liberty, some judge shall lay his hand upon this measure and write across it the word "unconstitutional." Then, perhaps, there will be another attempt similar to this.

I repeat what I have said so often: No man desires to go further than I do to stop rent profiteering in the city of Washington. The man who seeks to make exorbitant profits out of this war is unworthy the name of American citizen. The rent hog is as contemptible an animal as ever disgraced a civilized community; but because there are rent hogs in Washington, I decline to strike down a Constitution that it took thousands of years of human effort to indite and to have finally adopted. Can we not come to the proposition of taxing these profiteers so that they will find it unprofitable to profiteer?

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have concluded my remarks. Before the Senator from Idaho begins, I desire to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before that suggestion is made, may I ask whether the Senator in charge of this measure desires to dispose of it immediately?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Just as soon as possible, Mr. President.

Mr. BORAH. I am not about to address myself to this particular subject, but to another subject, and I do not want to take advantage of it if the Senator wishes to dispose of this proposition.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am very anxious to do so; and I will say to the Senator that one reason is that there are many cases of this rent profiteering which may become effective if this joint resolution is not adopted and in effect before the 1st of June. Therefore I am anxious to get it through, so that it can be signed by the President immediately, if he sees fit.

Mr. BORAH. I suppose we ought to have a quorum.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should think so.

Mr. BORAH. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, before the Senator makes that suggestion, out of order I desire to make a motion that a report filed by the Secretary of Agriculture some time since, in response to a resolution of the Senate——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I make the point of order that nothing can be legally done after the absence of a quorum has been suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILFLEY in the chair). The point of order is well taken.

Mr. SHIELDS. I ask the Senator to withhold his suggestion or to withdraw it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That can not be done. It is in the record.

Mr. SHIELDS. I suppose the Senator can withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Henderson	Nugent	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Hitchcock	Overman	Smoot
Calder	Johnson, Cal.	Page	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. D.	Penrose	Thomas
Colt	Jones, N. Mex.	Pittman	Thompson
Cummins	Kellogg	Poindexter	Trammell
Curtis	Kendrick	Pomerene	Underwood
Dillingham	Kenyon	Reed	Vardaman
Fall	King	Saulsbury	Wadsworth
Fletcher	Lewis	Sheppard	Walsh
France	McLean	Sherman	Warren
Gallinger	McNary	Shields	Wilfley
Guion	Myers	Simmons
Harding	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.
Hardwick	Norris	Smith, Md.

Mr. SHIELDS. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. MCKELLAR] is absent on official business. I wish to have this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, having just entered the Chamber may I ask what conference report is this?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the conference report on the joint resolution to prevent rent profiteering in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Delaware if the conference report has been printed?

Mr. SAULSBURY. The report has not been printed. The conference report was agreed to by the House of Representatives on Saturday, I think, and was sent over here, and the Senate report was made this morning.

Mr. GALLINGER. What about the time limit concerning which there has been some controversy?

Mr. SAULSBURY. There have been only two amendments made that amount to anything. One was to reduce the time limit to the actual period of the war, cutting off the year after the war which the House provided for, and the other was to correct the phraseology in regard to the leases, confining it solely to leases. Those are practically the only two amendments.

Mr. GALLINGER. So that if the war should continue for 5 years or 10 years this statute will continue in force?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Unless Congress otherwise provided in the meantime, which of course it could do anyway.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; but which the Senator knows Congress probably will not do.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I can not agree to that, Mr. President, because I sincerely hope, and I think every member of the District of Columbia Committee hopes, that Congress will provide a very comprehensive remedy.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that doubtless is the opinion of the Senator from Delaware, but some of us know to the contrary. This report ought to have been printed, so as to give us an opportunity to examine it. I will suggest to the Senator from Delaware that that is the usual course, and it ought to have been followed in this case.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If I may interrupt the Senator, unanimous consent was given to proceed to the consideration of the conference report, as I understand it. At any rate the Senate directed that we should proceed to its consideration, and it seems to be no good object can be served by delay. It is very important from the standpoint of people who believe that this legislation should be passed that it should be passed as quickly as possible, and before the 1st of June.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the joint resolution is not going to do me any particular good or any great harm personally. So I would not oppose it or advocate it from any selfish standpoint; but I have very serious apprehension that it is bad legislation and that it will do a great deal of harm to a great many good people in the District of Columbia. On that point I may be mistaken, but I believe not. There is certainly a very wide difference of opinion as to that matter. However, if unanimous consent has been given to proceed with the conference report, I certainly can find no fault with the procedure.

In this morning's mail I received a letter from a friend of mine, a man who has resided in this District for a great many years, a man of affairs, of large business, and while he did not ask me to have it put in the RECORD, neither did he suggest that I should not so use it. I confess that in the strain and stress of legislative business which has been upon some of us, especially those of us who have been struggling with the District of Columbia appropriation bill, I have not had time to give to the consideration of this matter the attention that its importance deserves. I will ask that the letter that I have alluded to be read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 27, 1918.

Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: May I trouble you to read the inclosed correspondence relative to the Atlantic Building?

Up to three years ago the Forestry Bureau was paying us $24,000 a year. At that time when business was fearfully depressed in Washington, no demand for offices, and offices being given up, the Forestry Bureau served notice on us that unless the rent was reduced to $18,000 they would move out. We were compelled to accept. Under the operation of that lease, owing to the increased cost in maintenance we were unable to pay, the first year and a half more than a fraction over 1 per cent and the second year and a half we were losers of about $2,000.

If the Saulsbury resolution passes the shareholders of the Atlantic Building Co. will be deprived of all income, and in addition thereto will be called on to make up a deficit of about $4,000 a year. No greater injustice, I am sure you will agree with me, could be inflicted upon innocent and dependent people.

For my own offices I pay $1.35 per square foot. The Government is paying at the Atlantic Building a fraction over 51 cents. It seems as if Congress is about to make a law that will protect the Government from being robbed and at the same time to enact a law that will permit the Government to rob other people. I do not know if anything can be done now, Senator, but if it can I am sure your great sense of justice and right will interest itself.

Yours, very truly, MYRON M. PARKER.

P. S.—There is nothing in the Saulsbury resolution that would prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from increasing the rent in the Atlantic Building, but the question is, Will he do it?

M. M. P.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is a letter attached which I should like to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

MARCH 9, 1918.

Hon. BEN JOHNSON,
House of Representatives, City.

DEAR SIR: In 1900 when I was elected president of the Atlantic Building Co., a large office building, as you know, on F Street, between Ninth and Tenth Streets NW., it was then occupied by commercial tenants, with the exception of two floors which were used by the Indian Office. The rental at that time was a little in excess of $37,500 a year.

At a later period the Indian Office moved out into the old post-office building. An application was at once made by the Bureau of Forestry for some of the space left vacant by the Indian Office. At that time the Forestry Bureau only occupied three or four small rooms in the old Department of Agriculture Building.

We made a lease with the Forestry Bureau for space required by them on one of the vacant floors, and at the request of the bureau it was stipulated that further space should be given as required. We little thought at that time that the requirements of the bureau would reach beyond the two vacant floors for many years, but the growth of the bureau was phenomenal, and from time to time within a very limited period further space was required until we were compelled to dispossess old and reliable tenants who had been in the building since its construction. This continued until the entire building was vacated for the use of the Forestry Bureau, with the exception of two stories on the first floor and a small room in the back. It was also stipulated in the lease that as further space was required it should be at the same rent as originally agreed upon.

By this agreement the Forestry Bureau were able to occupy the building at an annual rental of $24,000, as against $37,500 we were obtaining when they first moved in.

Three years ago on the 30th of next June the lease of the Forestry Bureau expired, and that at a time when great business depression prevailed in Washington, and there was little or no demand for office space. Evidently taking advantage of this, the bureau served notice on the Atlantic Building Co. that unless the rent was reduced to $18,000 a year they would move out. There seeming to be no alternative at that time, and not desiring to have a vacant building, we entered into a lease on these terms.

Under the provisions of this lease we were unable to pay the first two years more than 1 per cent dividend to the shareholders. Owing to the marked increased cost of operations, coal, and the salary of the employees, the company will lose on this last year tenancy over $1,000.

The stock of the Atlantic Building Co. is largely held by small beneficiaries of estates, many of whom are women and largely dependent on the income from their stock in this building. Among these beneficiaries, I might say, are the granddaughters of the late Dr. Garnett, who, as you may remember, was a distinguished surgeon in the Confederate Army. Should this bill be enacted into law you will readily see what great hardship and injustice it would inflict on these shareholders. Even at an increase of 10 per cent on the present rental of $18,000 no dividend could be paid to the shareholders during the continuance of the lease. If expenses of operations should continue to increase, it would be operated at a loss, as it has done during the past year.

I, therefore, as president of the Atlantic Building Co., charged with representing their interests, appeal to you to so amend your bill as to enable the beneficiaries to receive a fair return on their investment and relieve the Atlantic Building Co. of the burden that would be cast upon it.

The Atlantic Building is easily worth to-day $500,000.

Very truly, yours,

MYRON M. PARKER,
President Atlantic Building Co.

Mr. HARDWICK obtained the floor.

Mr. SAULSBURY. May I say to the Senator from New Hampshire that the president of the Atlantic Building Co. was before the committee and gave all the facts in regard to the building. The joint resolution does not stop him from making with the Secretary of Agriculture a fair lease if the Secretary is willing to do it. I think there is some question about whether the present terms of the lease are fair or not. The committee has taken up many of these particular cases and has unanimously come to the conclusion that a joint resolution of this kind should be passed, as well as the law which is proposed to make a comprehensive system of legislation on the subject.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator from Delaware——

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, have I not the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia has been recognized.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I beg the Senator's pardon if I inadvertently began to speak in his time.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is all right. The Senator knows that I am always glad to yield to any Senator, but I have only a few words to say and I thought I would get rid of them.

Mr. President, I do not know on what theory this resolution was framed or on what theory it is presented to the Senate unless it is upon the theory that we no longer have a written Constitution and that none of its guarantees are in force, because there is no lawyer of intelligence who has considered this question carefully who will, in my judgment, contend for one moment that this proposition does not violate the provisions of the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. President, what is the proposition that is submitted to us? It is simply this, that when anybody in the District of Columbia has either orally or by written contract rented premises in the District for a period of as much as one month or longer, although the contract may provide that the term of the lease is only three months, it shall be continued indefinitely at the option of the lessee, without regard to the rights of the lessor and without compensation even if it can be shown as a matter of fact that he is entitled to more, and without regard to the provisions of the fifth amendment, which provides for the protection of life and property all over the United States and even in the District of Columbia, and without even a pretense that the property is taken for a public use under the provisions of the fifth amendment, and without, of course, providing for any sort of process of law to ascertain what is the value of the property so commandeered.

Mr. President, I venture the assertion that no court in this country ever called upon to pass on this question will ever uphold any of its provisions. As long as the Constitution of the United States is in force and my oath to support it and obey it and uphold it dwells within the chambers of my memory, so long will I find it impossible to vote for a proposition that I know is so utterly abhorrent to the provisions of the Constitution that I have sworn to support.

Not only that, Mr. President, but let me invite the attention of the Senate again to another remarkable proposition; that is, the retroactive feature of this resolution. Anybody in the District of Columbia, whether sojourning here from caprice or for pleasure, for social reasons or whatnot, who happens to have rented a piece of property for as much as one month or longer, either by written agreement or by oral contract, if such person desires to keep the property he can keep it at the same rate fixed in the short period for which he may have rented it as long as this war shall last.

Not only that, but provision is made that this law shall be enforced retroactively—shall be applied to contracts made before its enactment. Let me read the language:

> And where such order, decree, or judgment has been made but not executed before the passage of this resolution the court by which the order, decree, or judgment was made shall, if it is of the opinion that the order, decree, or judgment would not have been made if this resolution had been in force at the date of the making of the order, decree, or judgment, rescind or modify the order, decree, or judgment in such manner as the court may deem proper for the purpose of giving effect to this resolution.

Clearly an ex post facto application. You are going to turn around, even when the parties have gone to the courts for their remedy before this statute was enacted, and say we will give it an ex post facto application, and if the courts were of the opinion that this thing would have fallen within the terms of this legislation before the date of its enactment, then the same rule established by this legislation for other transactions shall apply to past transactions.

Gentlemen, it would be an insult, as I view it, to the intelligence of this body if I were to argue any such proposition. Surely we are not so excited and hysterical that we can believe that measures of this sort are worth the paper they are written on or that the courts anywhere in an Anglo-Saxon country where love of justice and the fundamental principles of a wise jurisprudence prevails will enforce any such proposition as this. I hate to see the Senate seriously asked to commit itself to the enactment of legislation of this character.

Mr. President, we are, of course, laboring under some excitement. Hysteria stalks abroad in the land, and naturally so; but surely this body, unless we are prepared to abandon the fundamentals in which we have always believed, unless we are prepared to renounce the principles upon which our jurisprudence rests and upon which our civilization itself is built, will not seriously consider this sort of a proposition.

Mr. President, I have no doubt that under the war power the Government in a time of war can commandeer any sort of property it needs, whether that property is real or personal; and if it be real property, whether it is an estate of freehold or leasehold; but it can only commandeer property for a public use. It can not commandeer property for private uses. It can not condemn A's property to give it to B, either perpetually or for a period of time, either for a high price or for a low price.

The fifth amendment provides that private property may be taken for public uses, and even then not without just compensation. Just compensation for the use of property is not some yardstick that is set up by legislative decree, not some rental that may be fixed even for a limited period of time by private contract between the parties, applicable only to that period of time, but just compensation for private property that is taken for public uses means what the property is really worth as determined by a court and jury under due process of law.

If it were necessary, and it may be undoubtedly, the Government of the United States can condemn every estate of freehold and leasehold in the District of Columbia even to house the workers in the civil department of the Government whose services are necessary for the maintenance and operation of the Government and the conduct of the war, although not directly related to it; but surely it can go no further than that. Surely it can not commandeer any more than a State legislature can commandeer A's property to give it to B for any stated sum or for any given period of time.

So if we are to do anything about this question, and I think possibly we ought to do something, we ought to provide a very simple piece of legislation which will authorize the Government to commandeer for the use of its own employees whose services are indispensable to its conduct and to the conduct of the war estates of freehold or leasehold, and then provide the value of those estates, whether taken for one month, one year, or one century, shall be that just compensation that a court and jury may determine. When we have done that we will have exhausted our power. When we have done that we will have provided an adequate remedy for any evil that may exist. When we undertake to do more than that we utterly defeat the purposes we profess to serve, because we pass an act, if we pass it at all, that no court can enforce or will enforce.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the purpose of the Senator from Delaware, who I understand is the author of the resolution——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegee	Hitchcock	Penrose	Sutherland
Calder	Johnson, Cal.	Poindexter	Thomas
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Ransdell	Thompson
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Saulsbury	Townsend
Curtis	Kenyon	Shafroth	Trammell
Fletcher	McCumber	Sheppard	Underwood
France	McNary	Sherman	Wadsworth
Frelinghuysen	Martin	Shields	Warren
Gallinger	Norris	Smith, Ariz.	Wilfley
Gronna	Nugent	Smith, Mich.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My colleague, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-two Senators have answered to their names—less than a quorum. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators and Mr. BORAH, Mr. HARDING, Mr. HARDWICK, Mr. KELLOGG, and Mr. REED answered to their names when called.

Mr. FALL, Mr. SMITH of Maryland, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. PHELAN, Mr. KIRBY, Mr. LEWIS, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. HENDERSON, Mr. BAIRD, Mr. KING, and Mr. SMITH of South Carolina entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. NUGENT. I wish to announce that the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] are absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] is entitled to the floor and will proceed.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I was about to remark when the call for a quorum intervened that the purpose of the author of the joint resolution is fairly clear, and I am quite ready to say that it is a laudable purpose; but the manner in which the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] has worked out his purpose it is impossible for me to approve. What is desired, undoubtedly, is to secure a reasonable rental upon that part of the property in the District of Columbia which is subject to rent. I am sorry the Senator from Delaware is not in the Chamber at this moment, because I should like to have him either affirm or disaffirm that proposition. I, however, will assume that his object was to protect those who are compelled to rent property in the District of Columbia from unreasonable exactions on the part of those who own the property. It was evidently the purpose of the author of the joint resolution to take away from the owner of property the right which he ordinarily has to determine at what rate he will allow some one else to use it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I merely desire to say that the Senator from Delaware stepped out just a moment ago and stated that he would return in a very few moments.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know that he can be easily informed of what I am saying, so I shall not pause, for I do not intend to say anything he would not be glad to hear.

There is but one way in which the right of an owner of property to determine what he shall receive for it in the event of its rental can be taken from the owner. I believe in a system in the present emergency which will not allow the owner of property, either for rental or for sale, to determine conclusively what it shall be rented for or what it shall be sold for, but I hope that some attention will be given to the fundamental law of the land in pursuing the object we have in view. In this joint resolution no attention whatsoever, in my opinion, has been given to the guide or the restrictions of the Constitution. That, however, is not the point that I have particularly in mind and which I desire to lay before the members of the committee who reported the joint resolution which is now before us, in the hope that we may secure some readjustment or rearrangement of the proposed legislation.

I am willing that we shall take away—I think we ought to take away—the right of the landlord to determine finally what shall be paid for premises that are needed in the prosecution of the war; but what justification is there—and I put this now in all seriousness to Senators—in a case in which the Government does not want the property for taking away from the landlord the right to determine who shall occupy the premises and who shall pay the rent which is determined upon? That is just as important a right as is the right to determine how much shall be paid.

While I do not think that the Congress has any constitutional power to say that the rent for the future shall be measured by the rent for the past, I can not conceive that we have any power of that kind; yet grant it, let us admit, for the purposes of argument, that Congress has the right to say to the property owners of the District: "You shall charge no more for your premises under lease than you have charged in some former period"; let us admit that, although I do not think it can be justified by any principle of law with which this country is familiar; but let us take the next step. How can you justify or defend the proposition that you will take away from the landlord not only the right to determine the value of his premises but that you will take away from him the right to determine who shall occupy the premises? Are you assuming that those who occupy the rented property in the District of Columbia are the persons above all other persons who ought to occupy the property? Are you assuming that those who now enjoy the possession of rented buildings, rented apartments, and the like, are the persons whose possession of that property will most greatly contribute to the prosecution of the war or to the welfare of the country? It is monstrous to assume any such thing as that.

I can understand how a Senator who already has rented his apartment, if he lives in an apartment, is entirely satisfied with legislation of this character; but suppose there be a Senator here who has yet to rent an apartment for the coming year, are you going to inflict upon him the injustice of saying that no landlord can rent property to him at a given price, if there happens to be a tenant already in possession of the property whose right to occupy it expires, we will say, on the 1st of October? It is a most absurd proposal. It is outrageously unjust to say that those who are not so favored as to be in possession of a property which they desire to occupy on the 1st of October shall have no opportunity whatever to invoke the unquestionable right of the landlord to determine as between two persons who shall receive a lease.

I agree that if there are two persons, both intending to rent property, one of whom is necessary to the Government in the prosecution of the war, or in any other important function of the Government, he ought to have the preference; and those who are here without any real reason ought to be excluded; but this joint resolution does not provide for anything of that kind. On the contrary, this joint resolution makes secure the possession of thousands of men and women in the city of Washington who ought not to be here at all; who have no connection with the Government; whose presence is not necessary to anything the Government is doing. Tell me why it is desired to legislate those persons into permanent occupancy of the buildings in the District of Columbia, excluding those who live in the District, and may be vastly more essential to the things we are attempting to do than those who are already in those buildings and apartments?

I do not know that the joint resolution does in its essence any injustice to landlords in so far as the amount of the rent is concerned; I do not know anything about that. I do feel, however, that we are erecting a standard here that is not recognized by the law, and which the first court that has an opportunity to approach the subject will overturn. But I pass that.

Why do you do injustice to those who want to rent property at the standard which may be fixed in the joint resolution? Why are you not content to say that rentals of property in the District of Columbia shall not be greater than as stipulated in the leases now in force or in existence? In that way the title of the joint resolution would be fulfilled—that is, it is assumed it would be fulfilled—because the title of the joint resolution is to prevent profiteering.

Well, is it profiteering for a landlord when, at the expiration of the lease which may now be in existence, to choose Mr. Jones as his tenant instead of Mr. Smith, who is now in possession at the same rental? There is no profiteering in that instance. It is simply leaving the landlord the right to select his tenant until the Government shall intervene and say the property is needed for governmental purposes; and there is no provision in the joint resolution for any contingency of that kind. There is a provision in the joint resolution that one can not be evicted under any circumstances if his work is necessary to the Government; but the point that I make is not provided for in the joint resolution in anyway. I protest against attempting to exclude from the opportunity to negotiate and contract with the landlord at a given rental, if you please, all those who are not in possession under a lease of property in this District. Such a thing as this was never heard of before. If anyone had suggested that a proposal of this kind could find even toleration in the Senate of the United States, I would have laughed at him, for we are here not only attempting to regulate the amount that shall be paid for rented premises but we are attempting to describe those who are to occupy the premises as well, even though they have nothing whatsoever to do with the Government, and even though their presence in the city of Washington or in the District of Columbia is harmful rather than helpful.

I sincerely hope that those Senators who have been standing for the joint resolution, with an object in view in which we all concur, will at least permit a revision of the joint resolution, so that it will control only the amount of rental, and will not control the persons who are to occupy the buildings or the grounds, as the case may be.

There is but one way in which to accomplish this change, and that is by defeating the conference report; and I for one hope that it will be defeated, so that some people whom I know very well, who really desire to rent property after the 1st of October, and whose presence in Washington is quite as necessary as that of a great many who now occupy premises, may have at least an opportunity to invoke the choice of the owners of the property at the rental which may be determined by this act.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I had not intended to say a word on this subject. I feel, however, in justice to the members of the District Committee, that I ought to speak briefly. Allow me to say preliminarily that I realize that this joint resolution is not a complete piece of legislation. The District Committee took this matter up as seriously as any committee ever took up any piece of legislation. They reported a bill which passed the Senate, and is now awaiting the action of the other House. In the midst of our deliberations we were confronted by the fact that there were not only hundreds but thousands of tenants in this District who would be dispossessed on June 1, thrown bodily into the streets, unless they submitted to the exactions of a lot of profiteering landlords. Let us keep that fact before us when we are considering what we are going to do with the pending joint resolution.

There is a great deal of force in what the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has said about the right of a landlord to say who shall occupy his building, but we must not forget that up to date the landlords have decided who their tenants should be, and those tenants up to this date have been paying very liberal rentals. Now, while some of these landlords think they have the opportunity to throw their tenants whom they selected into the street or compel them to pay an increase of from 33⅓ to 100 per cent in their rents, and while some of them are acting like Shylocks, we have technical objections raised here. Some Senators refuse to support the conference report because here and there it may result in injustice, and lose sight of the fact that if it is not passed thousands will be thrown into the street.

Mr. President, there has been a good deal said about the Constitution. With all due respect to those who are raising the question of the unconstitutionality of this act, I love that old instrument just as much as they do, but I am not so obsessed with the idea that I have so much more learning in my cranium that I am going to consign everybody to the bowwows because he does not agree with me upon the subject.

I do not believe that a court is going to hold this joint resolution unconstitutional. If I did so believe, I would not vote for it; and those Senators who believe that it is unconstitutional ought not, out of respect to their oaths, to vote for it; but I am not going to surrender my judgment because I am being anathematized on account of difference of opinion.

Some time ago we passed the civil-rights bill; we have suspended remedies against our soldiers and sailors; and the same constitutional authorities that we hear every day when a constitutional question comes up condemned that measure and insisted that the families of soldiers and sailors should be at the mercy of creditors while they were fighting our battles along the battle line. In my humble judgment, this Government has the power to do anything within the limits of the Constitution which may be necessary for the defense of our Government.

Now, let us see what the situation is here in the District. In the first place, the Constitution of the United States gives to the Congress of the United States absolute legislative authority over persons and property in the District, and the only limitations upon that authority are those contained in the Constitution itself. By common consent of everybody, save only those who find constitutional objections to everything, we have the right to pass moratorium laws. We did it during the Civil War. Even the States passed such laws, though their powers were more limited than the powers of Congress over the District. And, again, during the present war in many of the States moratorium laws have been passed to protect the families of the soldiers.

It is said, however, that this measure is not limited to the families of soldiers. That is true; but let me suggest in time of war is it not necessary to the welfare of the Government that its employees be properly housed who are in the Treasury Department, or in the State Department, or in the Post Office Department? Will it not add to our efficiency in war if all the Government employees are not left to the tender mercies of those who would exact the pound of flesh?

While there are some people in this District who ought not to be here, there are many other people in the employment of stores and private firms and none of them could be dispensed with in this time of war, because the families of the Government employees must be properly served at their groceries, at their clothing establishments, at all the mercantile establishments of the District. Shall they be left without protection when there is no one save Congress to protect them?

This is the situation, and Senators may take their choice: Shall we hold before ourselves the inalienable right of a profiteering landlord to say, "I want Jones to get out of my house in order that I can put Smith in," when his real reason for making a change is because he expects to get twice the amount of rent out of Smith that he got out of Jones? Shall we hold that "it is nominated in the bond" of the Constitution that the landlord shall do with his own that which he pleases and ignore the rights of the tenant? Shall the Senate of the United States say to the thousands of Government employees and other people of modest means who live within the District, "Go into the street; my views of the Constitution are such that I can not and will not give you relief"?

Now, Senators, what is to be done? I have hope that within a few days the Members of the other House will come to the conclusion that they must meet us in conference, and I have hope that we are going to agree on a measure. I am not willing now to say that the Congress of the United States will continue unreasonably to quibble over differences of views while many of the people of the District are on the streets.

Mr. President, when the civil-rights bill was before the House that very able lawyer in the House, Mr. WEBB, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted a report. I wish to read just a paragraph from that report, because surely it clearly and properly represents the law as we understand it. In discussing that bill and the suspension of remedies, he says:

> The committee, however, does not find it necessary to rely upon the language of the court above cited as to the application of these amendments to the war power, for, as stated, neither of the clauses by their terms or by their construction, either in letter or in spirit, covers the case of the various measures of relief embodied in this bill.
> Finally, the committee beg to remind the Congress that the due-process clause has never been held to deprive the State of the power of protecting the welfare of its citizens, even at the expense of restricting and destroying life, liberty, and property. A hundred instances will readily suggest themselves. And it has been well said:
> "If a State may thus, notwithstanding a due-process limitation, interfere with life, liberty, and property for the sake of health, morals, quiet, and the like, it follows, a fortiori, that notwithstanding a due-process restriction the United States may interfere with life, liberty, and property for the sake of protecting the very existence of the Government itself."
> If this may be done by the State without impairment of the constitutional prohibition, surely the Federal Congress, in the prosecution of the war, may not only conscript the life of the citizen, but may under the guarded discretion of the judges of the land as proposed in this measure interfere with the property of the individual to the extent that such interference has been countenanced in this act for a purpose directly relating to the conduct of the war and the preservation of the morale and the self-respect and the peace of mind of the citizen soldier whose body has been conscripted and taken from the peaseful walks of business life.

The Federal Constitution provides that no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts.

There are no such limitations in that behalf upon the power of Congress with respect to our legislative authority over the District. We are not impairing the obligation of contracts by this legislation. We are simply suspending the landlord's remedies. Who is it who wants to take the position that at the very moment when we see these people about to be put on the streets we can not suspend the right to sue out a writ of ejectment?

We say by this resolution, in substance, if these people shall continue to pay the rent that by contract they have been paying heretofore during the period of the war, and comply with the terms of the lease, they shall not be dispossessed.

I do not expect this legislation to be permanent. I, for one, would not have consented to it if I had thought it was to be permanent; but while it may operate in certain instances as an injustice upon a few people, I am confident that it is going to do vastly more good to a vastly larger number of people than it will injure, and I do not believe it will do very serious injury to any of them.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not clearly understand the Senator's reference to the powers of Congress, in its legislation over the District of Columbia, as distinguished from those of the States. Do I understand the Senator to claim that Congress is not subject to the constitutional provisions in legislating for the District of Columbia?

Mr. POMERENE. I am afraid the Senator did not hear the earlier part of my statement.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I heard both parts, but I did not understand either.

Mr. POMERENE. I am very sorry. I am sure it was my fault if I did not make myself clear.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; I think very likely it was the fault of neither of us; but I thought the Senator might be able to clear up that matter in my mind.

Mr. POMERENE. I said that our power was complete, save and except as it was limited by the provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then it is no more complete than the powers of anybody that is limited by the provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, yes, it is; because there is a limitation placed upon the right of the States to interfere with the right of contract. That is an inhibition against the power of the States to interfere with the right of contract, and that was what I was trying to make clear when I read from the report of Judge Webb.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator think that Congress can impair the obligation of a contract?

Mr. POMERENE. Why, we have been doing it incidentally right along when we passed certain prohibition laws and other laws affecting the health, morals, and comfort of the people. There have been a good many instances of it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not doubt that Congress has passed many an unconstitutional act. Some of them have not been tested and so declared; but does the Senator think that Congress can constitutionally pass a law impairing the obligation of a contract?

Mr. POMERENE. As a general proposition, perhaps it ought not to; but because it incidentally interferes with the power of contract it will not thereby vitiate legislation, in my judgment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not understand the distinction between doing it and incidentally doing it.

Mr. POMERENE. Perhaps I have not been able to make myself as clear as I should, but that is my view of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. FRANCE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegee	Guion	Overman	Smith, Ariz.
Chamberlain	Harding	Page	Smith, Ga.
Culberson	Johnson, Cal.	Phelan	Smith, Md.
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	Pittman	Smith, Mich.
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	Poindexter	Smoot
Dillingham	Kellogg	Pomerene	Sutherland
Fall	Kenyon	Ransdell	Thomas
Fernald	Kirby	Reed	Trammell
Fletcher	Lewis	Saulsbury	Vardaman
France	McNary	Shafroth	Wadsworth
Frelinghuysen	Myers	Sheppard	Warren
Gallinger	Norris	Shields	Wilfley

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] by reason of illness.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr.

GRONNA], and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT] are absent on important business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Only 48 Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, and Mr. TOWNSEND answered to their names when called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, now that the usual farce has been enacted of Senators being called into one door to leave immediately, either through the same door or some other door, I am going to occupy two or three minutes in some observations on this conference report.

First, I want to say that had I been present unanimous consent would not have been given for consideration of the conference report to-day, because this report, like all other conference reports, ought to be first printed, and Senators be given an opportunity to compare it with the bills that have passed both Houses and to examine in detail its provisions. That has been denied us. I do not know what is in the report, nor does any other Senator, except those who have had it in their charge.

I had read from the desk a little while ago a letter from a gentleman in charge of a large office building in this city—the Atlantic Building. Three years ago the Forest Service occupied a portion of that building. There were thousands of signs "To let" on the houses of Washington. There were great office buildings entirely vacant, without a single tenant in them. I have in mind now two such office buildings. The owners of the Atlantic Building—some of them people dependent almost entirely upon their dividends for their support—were renting it at a fair rental, not an exorbitant rental for the money that was invested in it, but at a fair rental. The Forest Service, seeing its opportunity, asked that that rental should be very largely reduced, notifying the proprietors that unless it was reduced they would move out. I was appealed to and asked to talk with some of the gentlemen connected with the Forest Service about this matter, a friend of mine being interested in the building, which I did; but they frankly said, "We can get a lower rental elsewhere, and unless the rental is reduced we will move out."

Under those circumstances, in the stress that was upon them, the proprietors of the building reduced the rental to a very large extent, so that since that time they have been getting practically 1 per cent on the money invested in that building. They are now renting it at 51 cents per square foot floor space. It will be remembered that not long ago, when attention was called to the great office building that is being erected on Vermont Avenue, and which the Government has taken over at a price of $4,300,000, the statement was made here that the price paid was not exorbitant because it was not much in excess, if in excess at all, of $1 per square foot; and yet the building to which I allude, the Atlantic Building, is being let at 51 cents per square foot, and, as I observe, the owners are getting 1 per cent by way of dividends. Now, it is proposed that that rental shall be continued during the balance of the war, unless, perchance, the Secretary of Agriculture concludes to allow a larger rental, which the Secretary of Agriculture may possibly do; but I doubt very much whether he will do it, or, if he does do it, whether an adequate rental will be allowed.

Mr. President, that is one case, but there are others in the city that are similarly situated as that building, and, as I observed a few minutes ago, while this measure may work to the advantage of some people, it will work to the great disadvantage of many other people in the District of Columbia. I feel sure that if the matter were given further consideration some more equitable measure could be evolved that would not do the injustice that this one certainly will do if it becomes a law.

I confess that I have not as definite knowledge of the measure as I ought to have. As I remarked a little while ago, we have all been busy, and I have been particularly busy in the Committee on Appropriations. I am going to ask the Senator from Delaware if this joint resolution particularly applies to people in the service of the Government, as was stated by some Senator? In other words, if I own a house in the city of Washington and desire to change my tenant, even to allow a man or woman in the service of the Government to occupy it, am I at liberty to do that?

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator is occupying the building himself and desires to rent it to some one—is that the question?

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I may not myself be occupying it, but the building is rented and I desire to change my tenant. Can I do so?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Under the joint resolution, if the tenant desired to stay there at the same rent, the Senator could not do it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, let me carry that a little further. I know a man who owns a building in the city of Washington which is rented. Since this joint resolution was introduced, or about that time, the occupant was notified to vacate the premises—of course, at the expiration of 30 days, and I believe an additional 7 days is allowed in the District of Columbia—and the owner of the building desired to have it vacated for the purpose of letting a man in the employ of the Government occupy it for 20 per cent less rent than he is getting at the present time; but he can not do that under this proposed law, can he?

Mr. SAULSBURY. The tenants can not be changed if they continue to pay their rent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Exactly; and I want to make this specific. I chance to own that building. I want it vacated to allow a man in the employment of the Government to occupy it at 20 per cent less than I am getting at the present moment, but it seems this legislation will not allow me to do it. That being so, we ought to stop talking of European autocracy.

Mr. SAULSBURY. There are doubtless a number of cases of which the Senator from New Hampshire and various other Senators know where some injustice, or what seems to be some unfairness, will be worked; but, on the other hand, we are familiar with the fact that there are hundreds and thousands of cases where, as shown by the letter of the Acting Secretary of the Navy, his force is being disorganized by the panic which has been produced by this rent profiteering; and, as we hear from clergymen, they are being begged to pray that the hard hearts of the rent profiteers in this District may be made more tender. Now, I am not exaggerating. I am informed that it is actually the case that in some cases clergymen have been asked to pray that the flinty hearts of the rent profiteers may be made more tender.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no doubt that that request has been made by somebody; but I have been unable to discover from my investigations that this wholesale accusation that is made against the owners of property in the District of Columbia is well founded. As I said the other day, I chance to occupy a very modest apartment in one of the largest apartment houses in Washington, and Senators around me occupy apartments in other great apartment houses in Washington, but we have not been notified that we are going to be dispossessed unless we pay more rent. My observation is that the most of this complaint comes from some small apartment houses, and that a large amount of the grievances is due to the fact that the parties occupying those apartments are subletting them at an enormous increase in rental.

Mr. President, there are grievances, no doubt; but, in my judgment, the harm that is going to come so completely outweighs the benefits that are going to accrue that I feel constrained to vote against the conference report. I think this matter could be worked out on a much more equitable system, and that the outrages that will necessarily result from this legislation could be avoided. I do not believe, Mr. President, that the owners of the Atlantic Building, who are getting 51 cents a square foot in rental, having been forced three years ago from the circumstance that there were so many vacant buildings in the city of Washington to reduce their rent, ought to be compelled by legislation of Congress to continue the same rental, netting them about 1 per cent on their investment; and yet that is exactly what this bill does.

As I said a few days ago, I have no disposition to delay the consideration of this conference report, notwithstanding the injustices its passage will work. The conference report ought to have been printed. It ought to have been on the desk of every Senator. We ought to have had an opportunity to examine it. That has been denied us, however, and so all I can do is to enter my protest against it and cast my vote against it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I desire very briefly to express my opposition to the acceptance of this conference report, and to state that I feel constrained to vote against it, not that I do not want some proper measure taken to prevent profiteering in the District of Columbia.

Mr. President, in my opinion this joint resolution is defective in so many respects that I am driven to the conclusion that it will do more harm than good. I agree entirely with the views expressed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. I think the joint resolution is absolutely unconstitutional, and will be so declared. Of course its constitutionality will be tested by the first party who is aggrieved by its operations.

A short time ago I was called out by a lawyer here in the city, who told me that he represents two estates here in Washington which at present are leasing two large tracts of vacant land.

It was necessary for the estate to borrow the sum of $10,000. The two vacant tracts of land were leased. The manager of the estate made arrangements with a Baltimore concern for the loan of $10,000 on those two tracts of land. Within a day or two the manager of the estate was visited by the party who had agreed to make the loan and told that he would have to withdraw his proposition to make the loan on that property; that if the land was to be continued to be rented at the same price that it was then during the whole war, which was an indefinite period, he could not loan any money for the parties he represented upon any such uncertain state of facts as that. It simply shows how the measure cuts one way as to all estates that are being handled for the benefit of widows and orphans and benevolent purposes.

I do not think there is any demand that business property in the District of Columbia should be subject to the provisions of this joint resolution. As I understand the grievance here in Washington, it is 100,000 new people having been dumped on this city in the last year, since we declared war, that they want bedrooms and beds; they want shelter, so that they can get off the streets. But merchants' stores, Mr. President, are rented in the part of the country that I come from—and I assume it is true here—for periods of 3, 5, or 10 years. No merchant will rent a store and put his fixtures in it and transfer the good will of his business to that location unless he has a lease sufficiently long to warrant him in making the expenditure and taking the risk.

Now, look at it. Here is a store which was rented 10 years ago, when Washington probably had a population of 200,000 less than are here to-day, considering the increased population that has been put upon this city since the war was declared. Ten years ago the rental of that store was fixed at what now seems a ridiculously small figure; yet under the operation of this joint resolution that lease is to be continued at the rent fixed 10 years ago, when the property was not worth one-quarter of what it is worth to-day, and it is to be so continued for an indefinite period, although the owner of the property may have mortgaged the property based upon the contract that he has made with the lessee that he was to recover possession to-day, and then was to sell the property and take up his mortgage and pay his debt. The owner may be under another existing contract to-day that upon the termination of this contract he will rent the property to somebody else, and yet this joint resolution steps in and absolutely declares nugatory that second contract and forces upon the landlord a contract which has terminated by its own terms and by the free act of the parties, and compels that contract, now expired, to continue in force for an indefinite period—during the war.

The joint resolution bristles with situations that can not be foreseen, but we may see enough of them now to know that it is exceedingly dangerous to vote for the measure. The only answer that is made to these criticisms, all of which are just and unanswerable, is that we are at war, and that Congress can do anything it wants when we are at war; that the due-process-of-law clause does not any longer exist; that we can confiscate for private parties, not for public purposes; that we can order what a landlord shall say to one tenant as against another, one bidder in the open market as against another, not for governmental purposes, not to win the war, but to interfere with the arrangement in the business community between the landlord and the tenant. There is no grievance whatever about the relation between the landlord and tenant in his property. The whole question is one of housing and lodging, and not how much a man who rents a store on F Street or Pennsylvania Avenue shall pay the landlord.

We are told we ought to vote for this measure because later on we are promised the distinguished chairman of the conference committee, the Senator from Delaware, will do his best to see that the Pomerene bill can get through both branches of Congress.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that in view of the fact that the rental value of business property rises and falls with the comparative prosperity or lack of prosperity of the business which is conducted in that property, this measure works a tremendous advantage to the storekeeper, we will say, who rented his property five or six years ago and who to-day is running an infinitely more prosperous business than he did when he originally rented the property.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is quite true.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As a matter of common justice, a division of the burdens or profits, whichever we may term the rental of office or business property, may be at least allowed according to the prosperity of the business that is going to be conducted in it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It seems to me so. As I said before, every merchant here who based his rent on what his business could afford to pay on a population of customers of 360,000, if it was so a year ago, and now there are 450,000 people, many of them the richest people of the country, who come here as his customers, may be making twice in profits what he made before and what he thought he could pay for his rent when he made the lease.

Furthermore, Mr. President, except in a very small percentage of cases, this only binds one party to the contract. It takes hold of the lessor, the landlord, and compels him to allow the tenant to stay in, but does it compel the tenant to stay in? No.

Suppose the value of the property has diminished, as it has in certain sections of the city, and suppose the landlord would like to have the tenant continue at the old rate, does this treat both parties to the contract the same? No; it is a jug-handled arrangement. It says that the tenant shall always have the advantage; that the landlord shall have nothing to say about it; that Congress will regulate the terms of the contract which the landlord makes, and the tenant can do as he pleases. The tenant is left free to abandon his contract when it is perfected. The landlord is compelled by the United States Government to continue the contract willy-nilly beyond the terms of his contract, to perform a contract that the United States Government is going to make him keep, and to perform it for an indefinite period, whether it results in foreclosure or ruin to him or to a trust company or to the estates of all the people who have their money in the fiduciary and mercantile and banking and investment companies of this country.

I am not attacking this proposition; I think some relief ought to be devised; but I say, simply because times are trying and people are excited and their emotions are deeply stirred, every time we see a grievance we must not cast down the limitations and provisions of the Constitution and rush into confiscation and anarchy and chaos. Mr. President, that will not tend to inspire confidence in this country or in its financial institutions, nor in the integrity and good judgment of its legislators, who are a part of the Government itself.

I do think, in view of what has been said about this measure, that no serious error will be committed and no serious damage will be done if this conference report should be rejected and the conferees and the committees of the two branches of Congress be given a few days more to see if something more equitable can not be worked out.

Mr. REED. Before the Senator takes his seat——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. Touching the question of what is a fair rent to charge, I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that I am informed the Director General of Railroads has issued an order raising freight rates all over the United States 25 per cent and raising passenger rates to 3 cents a mile, and in some instances to 3½ cents, a raise that in some places would be equivalent to 33⅓ per cent. I assume if this has been done it is upon the basis that values change, and wages are necessarily higher all along the line. If that is the situation, then surely it is a fact that ought to be considered in the making of an equitable adjustment of rent fixing in this District. The joint resolution seems to utterly ignore it. I wanted to call the Senator's attention to that fact.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think the Senator's remark is very germane. I see in the papers that the Director General has raised salaries and wages upon the railroads of the country to an amount which would total $300,000,000, if I have the figure correctly, and has made it retroactive, so that it goes back into the past. Of course, the Senator is entirely correct that the whole system of values, of wages, cost of living, and cost of products and materials has wavered and changed all over the country; it has surged up and gone back and surged up again.

Mr. REED. Let me call the Senator's attention to another matter.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

Mr. REED. Interest rates have enormously advanced. Let us assume the case of a man who built a structure in Washington and who fixed the rent so as to give him a fair return upon the cost of that building, and a part of the cost of the building—50 per cent of it—is represented by a trust deed that bears 4½ per cent interest. That trust deed is now maturing, and it can only be renewed at 7 per cent interest. What will be the effect of a measure of this kind under such circumstances?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am at a loss to describe the kind of embarrassment the man would be in. Money is now worth in the neighborhood of 7 per cent in the market, where it was 4 and 4½ per cent before. If he could not renew it at 4½ per cent he would have to renew it on the best terms he could get. It means that his expense is doubled, yet the rent is held by an act of Congress, his return from his property is held where it was when he could borrow money at 4 or 4½ per cent.

Mr. REED. Let me ask the Senator another question: Suppose a man was going away and knew he would be absent from the city for a period of four or five months and he wanted to have his property in extra good hands. Therefore, he rented it at a very low rental, possibly a nominal rental. Now, desiring to resume possession of it for the purpose of handling his property as his own, he finds himself confronted by a law which provides that the nominal rent shall continue indefinitely.

I want to ask the Senator now a question connected with that. Does he believe such a law as that can stand the test of the court?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; I do not. I stated so. I gave the Senator an instance on Saturday. I had read into the RECORD a letter written to me by a gentleman who is a large real-estate owner in this city, one of the leading men of the District of Columbia, giving the experience of his brother, who had erected an apartment house here within a year which contains 18 apartments. He rented those apartments at about $200 a month, which was a very modest rent. Eleven out of those 18 tenants have let those apartments at three times what they paid the landlord for them, and the landlord had to take the curse of it and be called a profiteer. Apartments which had been rented for $200 a month were sublet before the tenants had moved into them at $650. It is in large measure the tenants themselves who have created this distress and this profiteering, and not the landlords. Many a building here in Washington had been almost vacant for some years. As the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who knows the District as well as any other Senator, at least who was chairman of the District Committee for a number of years, said a few years ago pretty much one house out of every four had a sign "To let" upon it, and I doubt if real estate in this city, houses and tenants, netted the owners 3 per cent on the property in the last 10 years on an average.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. The signs were so numerous on the houses that at the instance of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] we legislated to prevent more than a certain number of signs to be placed on any given piece of property.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And of a certain size.

Mr. GALLINGER. And of a certain size.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I put another letter in the RECORD on Saturday from a gentleman, a real-estate man, who stated that he knew of a building in a business block here that cost the owner $100,000, and after holding it vacant for several years and paying the taxes and interest out of his own pocket and losing the rent he had finally rented it for $100 a month, the whole business building, in order that he might get $1,200 a year to help pay the taxes on it. He is now offered $7,000 a year for the building, which would be 7 per cent, and taking out 2 per cent for taxes and insurance would leave him a net of 5 per cent, irrespective of depreciation and repairs; and now he is to be compelled during the indefinite period of this war to continue the rent of the building for $1,200 a year, for which he was offered $7,000 for a legitimate purpose, a purpose that will not hinder the winning of the war at all, and he is compelled to let his tenant make the difference between $1,200 and $7,000. His tenant can turn around and rent it for $10,000 if he wants to. Under the joint resolution every tenant who early enough foresaw what was liable to happen and rented apartments and buildings at a cheap rent and then sublet them at four and five times what he paid for them is protected. The joint resolution ought to be entitled "A joint resolution to protect the profiteers in the collection of their extortionate profits," for it guarantees and gives immunity to every tenant profiteer who has deliberatly raised rents from three to four times what they ought to be without the expenditure of a dollar on his part.

Mr. President, as I have said, I am unable to vote for the conference report at this time. I think it can be bettered.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, no man can gainsay the serious nature of the objections urged this morning against favorable consideration of this measure. That it will operate unjustly and unfairly in some directions is inevitable. Any bill which has for its purpose the regulation of prices must inevitably react somewhere, and sometimes the consequences of the reaction may be more serious than the benefit derived from the measure.

But I am not impressed with the contention that because of these things the conference report should be rejected. Fundamentally the joint resolution, if it shall operate inequitably, will be a powerful stimulus to the early framing and enactment of a measure that wil be reasonably equitable, all things considered, and without something of this kind whereby conditions are kept in status quo pending final action we may or may not be able to reach a legislative solution of a very serious and overpowering situation in this District.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator think that this measure will furnish some relief against bad conditions?

Mr. THOMAS. If I did not think so, I would not support it.

Mr. REED. If it will furnish some relief against bad conditions, it will make conditions better than they are. Then how will it afford a stimulus to other legislation?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think inasmuch as the joint resolution while affording some relief will also produce some of the consequences which the Senator from Missouri and others predict, the interests which are thus affected will, instead of trying to prevent any legislation, as they are now doing, join with those of us who want to cure these difficulties in a legislative way, and iron them out in such manner as will produce the least possible discomfort and loss. Of course, that may or may not result from the enactment of the measure, but I am inclined to think that it will aid us in an early legislative solution of what may be called the District problem.

Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri directed the attention of the Senator from Connecticut a moment ago to the recent raise in freight rates upon the lines of transportation of the country. We also read in the morning press that the wages of the men have been increased. If it were possible to reach this situation by freight and wage raises there might be no necessity for the enactment of this or any measure, because I have noticed with some disappointment that every application for a raise of wages and salaries which comes to the Congress finds favorable consideration. But, Mr. President, the misfortune, if it is one, in times like these is that every raise in fixed compensation is attended by a corresponding raise in everything that is essential to existence.

I have iterated and reiterated this proposition so frequently during this session of Congress that I am afraid by this time its further repetition will be more of an infliction than an enlightenment of the Senate. The increase in the prices of all the necessities of life, generally speaking, is more rapid and larger in volume than the increase in wages and salaries, and as a consequence, if that practice is continued, in order to do away with an existing evil of serious proportions it will merely result in a race between employees whose salaries are increased and the material men who furnish him the necessities of life, sustenance, clothing, and so forth. So as matter of fact that sort of panacea gets us nowhere.

Mr. President, there is much in the contention of the Senator from Missouri regarding the constitutional features of this measure considered in its larger aspects, but subject of course to those fundamental conditions and principles which safeguard property and the rights of the citizen, the power of Congress over this District is absolute. My contention is that the constitutional basis of this legislation is found in that clause of the Constitution which gives to the Congress exclusive jurisdiction over the District. This District was created for the one purpose, and for the one purpose only, that it might be for all time the seat of government of the Republic. Provision was made by the fathers in the framing of the Constitution for just such a place, and as a matter of course the jurisdiction of the Congress of the United States, representing the legislative authority, attached to and became absolute over that particular spot, wherever it might be located. Its territorial dimensions have up to this time been greater than the pressure of governmental activities upon it, but even in times of peace those activities were constantly increasing.

The Government at every session of Congress extends the boundaries of its jurisdiction and takes in some particular sphere or element which up to that time was by negation, at least, supposed to be beyond its constitutional power and authority. The result has been a multiplication of bureaus and of commissions ad nauseam.

We have long ago become a bureaucracy, a condition that is inevitable, Mr. President, when Government activities are unduly extended. So at the time war was declared against Germany the activities of the Government had so multiplied and had so extended that the pressure upon the territory of the District was already noticeable. With the war that pressure became enormous and the smaller expansions in times of peace were infinitesimal as compared with the sudden influx into the District of Columbia of vast hordes of new employees, whose presence and whose labor are essential to the proper transaction of governmental business. They must be here. They have no choice about it until the Government shall, as I think it should during the period of the war, transfer some of these bureaus and commissions to other cities of the Union. Indeed that, to my mind, is the best solution of the problem of human congestion in this District. There is no reason in the world why the Fuel Commission and the Food Commission should not be in St. Louis and in Chicago, respectively. There is no reason in the world why the various bureaus of the Land Department should not be located during the period of the war somewhere in the territory of the public-domain States, where their work belongs and over which their jurisdiction extends. But there is only one authority which can do that, and that is the President of the United States under the provisions of the Overman Act. It is not likely that that kind of relief will come very soon.

Now, what confronts us in this District? There are probably 150,000 to 200,000 human beings here who were not needed here on the 6th day of April, 1917, when war was declared, but who are indispensable now. If one wants to obtain a fair notion of the expanse of activities of the Government since that time, all he has to do is to take an automobile and ride through the Mall, the business portion of the city, and the residence portion immediately adjoining the business portion. Apart from the vast ranges of barracks that have been constructed, temporary in their character yet crowded to overflowing, the fact is that many of our business buildings, a great many of our apartment houses, and other structures of unusual dimensions have been taken over by the Government and are occupied for public uses. A great many of the employees of the Government have their families here because they can not live anywhere else. They are constantly crowding, crowding, crowding beyond the capacity of the District to house them. That presents a problem of the first magnitude. It presents conditions which can only be reached by summary legislation. Any measure designed to secure shelter and a livelihood at reasonable rates for these men and women in the employ of the Government at this time is necessarily and essentially for a public purpose. Any bill designed to take property, real estate, and structures necessarily required by this situation is legislation for a public purpose, and the taking over of such property is the taking of it for a public use.

Mr. President, under our Constitution in time of war the Government may billet its soldiers in private residences and compel private families to maintain them. That can not be done in times of peace. It is just as much a public purpose to legislate for the purpose of securing shelter for the large army of civil employees as it would be to billet soldiers among private families in time of war if conditions warranted the practice.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. REED. I wish to ask the Senator a question, because I have great respect for his opinion as a lawyer. Is a bill which proposes to allow any tenant whatsoever, connected with the Government or disconnected with the Government, to occupy a piece of property the same thing as the Government taking a piece of property into which it proposes to put its soldiers?

Mr. THOMAS. No.

Mr. REED. Then the parallel that the Senator appeals to does not exist.

Mr. THOMAS. I may have been unfortunate in my expression of the parallel. The parallel which I attempted to draw was that between billeting the soldiers in time of war and the taking of private property for the housing of civil employees of the Government.

Mr. REED. But I call the Senator's attention to the fact that this joint resolution does not propose to take property for the housing of civil employees of the Government. It proposes to let A B, whether he is a citizen even of the United States or not, continue to occupy a piece of property. For instance, it protects the Chinese laundry just as effectively as it does an officer of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. It does prevent the institution of any change in the rate of rent in any existing contract, because that is essential to the protection of a large body of the employees of the Government now occupying quarters and whose rent may and probably will be enhanced unless they are protected by the Government. In doing that the joint resolution draws no distinction between the tenant who is an employee of the Government and the tenant who is not. I believe if it did draw such a distinction it might then be subject to a very serious objection as being class legislation.

Mr. REED. But, Mr. President, there is no such thing as class legislation applied to the District of Columbia. That is a limitation——

Mr. THOMAS. There is not, but there might be.

Mr. REED. No; there is not in the Constitution any such limitation. This is what I want to get at. I agree with the Senator that we being at war the Government has the right to commandeer and take over such property as is necessary to the progress of the war. But the Government in that case takes it over in its own name, does it not, and it must make just compensation?

Mr. THOMAS. That is true.

Mr. REED. This joint resolution does not take over the property in the name of the Government, but lets it remain in the hands of a private citizen who happens to have been a tenant.

Mr. THOMAS. That is true, Mr. President; the effect and operation of the joint resolution are local in that part of the country which bears the impress of war—the seat of government—and over which the Congress possesses exclusive jurisdiction.

Mr. REED. It does possess exclusive jurisdiction, but its only jurisdiction is such as it gets from the Constitution.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes; the Constitution is the measure and the limit of it.

Mr. REED. Now, let us assume that the Government being at war desired to quarter its soldiers on the premises of an individual, would not the Government in that event be taking that property for the time being, and would it not have to make just compensation?

Mr. THOMAS. It would be subjecting it, of course, to use for a public purpose, and it would be required to make compensation. But the owner is not dispossessed. He is burdened with an unusual situation.

Mr. REED. Does not this joint resolution propose to take the property of A and to transfer it to B, a private citizen, who may or may not have any connection with the Government?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, it operates upon those who are and those who are not employees of the Government; but in doing that I do not think it is subject to the charge of taking property without compensation, except in the sense that the compensation now enjoyed can not be increased during the war.

Mr. REED. Well, is it not taking property when you take away from the owner of the property the right to sell it or the right to lease it in accordance with the laws and customs of the land?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, it interferes with the rights of property, Mr. President; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. REED. Which is a property right.

Mr. THOMAS. But inasmuch as the greater includes the less, and inasmuch as in this District the sovereign problem of housing and overcongestion is right before us, we can not expect in a short time to frame and pass a joint resolution that will not do injustice somewhere. We are confronting an emergency.

Mr. REED. But, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me one more interrogatory——

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Are we justified in undertaking to disregard or in disregarding the Constitution of the United States and property rights merely because we have not time to draw a law?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not think we are justified in violating the Constitution, except in a crisis where the very existence of the Republic is imperiled, and the violation of part is necessary to save the balance of it; but the difference between myself and the Senator from Missouri is aimed directly at that proposition. In the District of Columbia, and because of the war conditions and the needs of the Government, I do not think that the Constitution is violated by this joint resolution, except in the modified sense that by these temporary interferences with the property of the landlord some of his rights are suspended, so to speak, until legislation of a more desirable character can be substituted for it.

Mr. REED. But, Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado is too good a lawyer to contend that the mere length of time you interfere with a man's constitutional rights is a thing that determines its constitutionality?

Mr. THOMAS. That is true, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. Of course, the Senator from Colorado does not think that the existence of the Nation is at stake in this joint resolution?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no; I think I can say with the Senator from Missouri, for whose legal ability I have the most profound respect—indeed, I regard the Senator as one of the ablest lawyers in the United States, a reputation which he has justly acquired by long service at the bar and upon this floor—if this measure were one that extended in its territorial operation beyond the seat of government, I think his contention would be absolutely unanswerable.

Mr. REED. Now, let me, then, get the Senator's view on that. Of course, we will not disagree about the facts at all, that all of those rights which are reserved to the States, and which therefore are taken away from the jurisdiction of the Federal Government when we come to legislate with reference to matters within the States, do not exist in the District of Columbia and do not limit the Federal Government's rights here. In other words, the Federal Government in the District of Columbia is a complete sovereign?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. REED. And yet the Senator will agree with me that the rights of the Federal Government—that is, of Congress and of the President—are subject to the general limitations of the Constitution; that is to say, a man living even in the District of Columbia has certain rights under the Constitution and to the protection of the law of the land?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. REED. One of those rights is that he shall not be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. That right exists even in the District of Columbia, does it not?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. REED. Well, if it does exist in the District of Columbia, and Congress proceeds to say to a man who happened to rent a piece of property for $10 a month last year, although the fair market value of it even last year was $100 a month, "Because you rented it last year at $10 to A. B. for a period of a year, you shall therefore be obliged to allow this man to live in your property during the next three years that this war may exist at the same rental," does that not deprive him of his property without due process of law?

Mr. THOMAS. Well, Mr. President, in a sense it does, and in a sense it does not. It prevents him from exercising the right which exists in time of peace and independently of an emergency like this of increasing his rent or refusing to rent his property at all; but, on the other hand, it preserves the status quo for the purpose of preventing further profiteering, which must necessarily result in great hardship and injury to the army of employees here upon whom the Government must rely if its business is to be properly transacted.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Colorado does not offer the latter part of that as a constitutional argument?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no; it is not a constitutional argument, but I think it is a condition which justifies legislation of this kind; otherwise it might be regarded as class legislation.

Mr. REED. I am thanking the Senator for very patiently permitting this interruption.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator's questions are always illuminating.

Mr. REED. And I am asking these questions in an appeal to the Senator: Is not the proper thing for us to do to follow the suggestion of the President this morning in his address—and which I do not claim was made especially with reference to this matter—that the profiteer can be reached through taxation; and, instead of passing a law here which is patently in the teeth of the Constitution, to pass a law that will so tax excessive rentals as to make it unprofitable for anyone to exact them? What is there about that that is impossible? Why can not that be done?

Mr. THOMAS. That is a most excellent suggestion, and I hope it will be accepted; but the difficulty is that conditions here are such that infinite suffering has been caused and is likely to be continued by changes in rental values reaching a point where the employees can not obtain shelter and have anything left upon which to live before we can enact legislation by means of which we can reach the profiteers' gains through the process of a revenue bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Why can not such a bill be passed in three days' time, if Congress wants to do it?

Mr. THOMAS. We could pass it within three days' time if Congress wanted to do it, but the Senator from Missouri knows no such measure will pass this body within such a period of time.

Mr. REED. Suppose it took three weeks?

Mr. THOMAS. We could not do it in that time.

Mr. REED. I think we could.

Mr. THOMAS. I hope the Senator's opinion will be verified by events.

Mr. REED. If we took three weeks, and then placed a very heavy tax, and this heavy tax began to fall upon the profiteer so that it would no longer be profitable to him to profiteer——

Mr. THOMAS. I might say then, Mr. President——

Mr. REED. We would reach the case of a lease that had already been made. If it had been made at an excessive and brutal profit, it would be reached.

Mr. THOMAS. When we do that we force the landlord to continue the high rentals in order that——

Mr. REED. Oh, no.

Mr. THOMAS. In order that he may meet the enormous tax thus placed upon his war profits.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, so that it will not be left in that shape, my proposition is that when a reasonable limit has been reached the Government shall take all the excess.

Mr. THOMAS. Is not that an interference with property rights?

Mr. REED. Not at all; that is the exercise of the right of taxation; and, as was well said by a justice of the Supreme Court, the right of taxation is the right of confiscation. We have almost gone to that point in reference to some of the excess-profits taxes which we have already passed, and I am ready to go further, and I think this Congress will go further, if we follow the President.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, may I inject a word?

Mr. THOMAS. Just a moment. We must not forget in the consideration of that feature of this question that the money which the Government takes through its lawful powers of excessive taxation will continue to come from the people whom we are trying to protect by this bill; and, while that would benefit the Government, I am afraid that the process would continue, and the men and women whom we would benefit and ought to benefit would obtain no relief whatever.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the Senator, with his alert mind, has anticipated the question I was going to ask him. How would it benefit the tenants of the District who are being profiteered this year and now by taking from the bank account of the profiteer next year the money they had paid him?

Mr. THOMAS. I am afraid that it would not.

Mr. REED. I do not want to leave that in doubt. Unquestionably the right of Congress to levy this tax and make it apply now exists.

Mr. THOMAS. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. REED. And Congress can make the tax date back if they so desire.

Mr. THOMAS. There is no doubt about that, either.

Mr. REED. There is no doubt about that, so that the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware does not cover the question.

Mr. THOMAS. I think that the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware was not only apt but well-nigh conclusive; and when I take into consideration the fact that prompt and summary legislation is practically an impossible thing in the Congress of the United States, I find sufficient to satisfy me that we should enact this joint resolution and then proceed with permanent legislation upon the subject.

Mr. REED. Let me say, before the Senator takes his seat, that a moment ago the argument was that this was a temporary measure, and it was said that we were speedily to follow it up by permanent legislation.

Mr. THOMAS. That was not my argument.

Mr. REED. No; it was not the Senator's argument; but it is the argument that has been made by the proponents of this measure.

Mr. THOMAS. What I said was that I thought this would expedite a permanent measure on the subject.

Mr. REED. Now, the ground seems to be shifted, and the position is taken that no other bill may be passed except this bill.

Mr. THOMAS. If I left that impression upon the Senator's mind, I am very glad he did not permit me to take my seat, as I intended to do. My criticism of our legislative processes was not confined to any particular measure. It was provoked by the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri that we could, if we would, speedily enact revenue legislation that would meet this difficulty. I say generally, independently of the bill that I hope will be brought in here and enacted regarding this particular subject, that it is difficult to secure speedy legislation upon any subject, and that that fact, together with the suggestions which I have attempted to offer upon this joint resolution, justify me, at least, in the position which I will take upon the joint resolution when we reach a final vote.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if I may ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat, he bases his position on the joint resolution, as I understand, largely on the ground of the necessity for taking care of people who are engaged in some relation to the activities of the Government?

Mr. THOMAS. And on our legislative power over the District.

Mr. FLETCHER. And on our legislative power over the District. Does not the Senator feel that to come within those rules the joint resolution ought to be limited in its application to persons engaged in the work of or employed by the Government?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not, for the reason that it might afford a loophole through which the very people against whom we are attempting here to legislate might escape.

Mr. FLETCHER. I can not see how that could be done, because it is easy enough to obtain the pay roll and list of employees of the Government.

Mr. THOMAS. It may not be possible to do so, but we should take no chances.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, turning to the law which is now on the statute books, entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," this proviso will be found:

Provided, That $10,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the amount hereby authorized shall be used only to build or acquire, as herein provided, housing accommodations within the District of Columbia for such Government employees as can not be housed as advantageously in other cities in the service of the Government.

We have voted $10,000,000 to build houses or to acquire houses for Government employees. I do not know whether or not the work has been started. If it has not been, certainly it ought to be started immediately. Ten million dollars would build 2,000 $5,000 houses in the District of Columbia, and 2,000 houses would go a long way toward solving the problem that is troubling the proponents of this joint resolution. Indeed, there is no reason why each house should cost $5,000, if built by the Government; and, to my mind, that relief ought to be available in the near future.

I am going to say one word more. I find in the evening paper just printed this headline, "Passenger rates 3 cents a mile; freight also up." Mr. President, we have been traveling in New England for 2¼ cents a mile; but the exigencies of the case, the peculiar situation, lead the Director of the Railroads to boost passenger fares to 3 cents a mile, as against 2¼ cents. Another headline reads, "Freight charges will be up 25 per cent." This is an acknowledgment of the fact that everything is on the upward trend; that we have got to be more liberal than was necessary under different conditions; and to say that men who own property in the District of Columbia shall not, because of existing conditions, be permitted to charge any more than they were charging a year ago or thereabouts, is, to my mind, an utter denial of their rights. We ought not to enact any such proposition into law.

Those of us who travel on the railroads and the men who send freight over the railroads of the country do not like the idea of paying more for passenger or freight service than they have been paying heretofore; but conditions are such that the Director General, under the direction, no doubt, of the President of the United States, has seen fit to make this 25 per cent increase. I believe in passenger rates it is more than a 25 per cent increase in many parts of our country.

So, Mr. President, it does seem to me that we ought to pause in this proposed legislation; that we ought to wait a little while, and that we ought to give the Government time to commence the erection of houses, for which $10,000,000 has been appropriated, to meet the emergency that exists so far as the employees of the Government are concerned. But I presume it has been ordained otherwise; and so all I can do is to enter, as I did a few moments ago, my protest against this legislation and cast my vote against the adoption of the conference report when the vote is taken.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I shall only delay the Senate by telling the Senator what a very prominent official of the Government said to me last night, and then I shall hope, after I suggest the absence of a quorum, that we may have a vote.

A very prominent official of the Government, who is now paying between seven and eight thousand dollars a year for his house, said to me yesterday afternoon that within the last week he had been notified that his rent was to be raised to $10,000. When he said that the house was not worth it his landlord replied, "Oh, this is our harvest time."

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, and hope that we shall soon have a vote on the conference report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Baird	Harding	Nugent	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Hardwick	Overman	Smith, Mich.
Chamberlain	Henderson	Page	Sutherland
Colt	Johnson, S. Dak.	Penrose	Swanson
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Phelan	Thomas
Curtis	Kellogg	Poindexter	Thompson
Dillingham	Kendrick	Pomerene	Townsend
Fernald	Kenyon	Reed	Trammell
Fletcher	Lewis	Saulsbury	Underwood
France	McNary	Shafroth	Vardaman
Gallinger	Martin	Sheppard	Warren
Gronna	Myers	Sherman	Wilfley
Guion	Norris	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. PITTMAN] is absent on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. SAULSBURY. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GUION (when his name was called). I wish to announce that I am paired with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] and vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SWANSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], who is unavoidably detained from the Senate. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (after having voted in the negative). I am paired for to-day and to-morrow with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN];

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES];

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]; and

The Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], which I transfer to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who has not voted, to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] and vote "yea."

The yeas and nays resulted as follows:

YEAS—31.

Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Phelan	Smith, Ga.
Colt	Kendrick	Poindexter	Smith, Md.
Curtis	Kenyon	Pomerene	Swanson
Dillingham	Kirby	Saulsbury	Thomas

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the question of agreeing to the report of the committee of conference, the yeas are 31 and the nays are 17; the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] being in the Senate Chamber, paired and not voting, the Chair declares the conference report agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 28, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 27, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We lift up our hearts in gratitude to Thee, our Father in Heaven, for all the disclosures Thou hast made of Thyself, especially for the disclosures in the incomparable life, character, and wonderful precepts which fell from the lips of the Master, which not only teach us the way and the truth and the life—but especially for the comforting and reassuring words:

"Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.

"Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls.

"For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light."

Again:

"Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in me.

"In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you."

The world is plunged into a terrible war, destructive beyond compare; thousands of hearts are borne down in sorrow and grief; grant that they may be comforted, sustained, and upheld by the precious words of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kentucky rise?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Under the rules of the House this is District day. However, the Committee on Pensions has an agreement under which they have precedence to-day; and, next, my colleague, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], desires to bring up an appropriation bill. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that when the appropriation bill has been disposed of that the next day thereafter may be given to the consideration of District bills.

The SPEAKER. Now, there are two appropriation bills.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I refer particularly to the urgent deficiency bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] asks unanimous consent that instead of bringing up his District bills to-day, which is District day, that he shall have the right of way immediately after this deficiency appropriation bill is disposed of. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire if that means, if the gentleman gets unanimous consent that this shall come up, that then if the House should wish to take up the Army bill we could not by a majority vote do so?

The SPEAKER. Why, the Chair thinks that if this order is made it shoves the Army bill out of the way until after the consideration of the District bill.

Mr. GILLETT. Then, temporarily, I shall object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the sealer of weights and measures for the District of Columbia has been to see me and has written to me, urging that a bill relating to weights and measures be brought up and passed as soon as possible; that every day, and many times every day in fact, many people are given short weights in ice, and if the purchaser of ice ask that it be weighed the ice man drives away and will not give him any ice; and where complaint is lodged with him on account of short weights of ice those lodging the complaints can not get ice at all. It does seem to me, with hot weather coming on, there ought to be some consideration given to the 75,000 or 100,000 clerks brought here to do the Government's work. They must have ice and should not be given short weight when they buy it.

Mr. GILLETT. I will say that if the gentlemen who are responsible for the business of the House think that it is more important to determine weights and measures for the District of Columbia than to pass the Army bill, I shall not object.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I thought we had an understanding that bills coming from the Committee on Military Affairs, except on special days, should have the right of way. Now, if the request of the gentleman from Kentucky is consented to, why of course it will make a special day for the consideration of his bills and cut out consideration of the military appropriation bill, which ought to be considered without a moment's delay.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will withdraw his request now, and that he will make it following the passage of the military appropriation bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I will modify the request——

Mr. KITCHIN. I have made arrangements with the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to take up that bill to-day.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I will modify my request by asking unanimous consent that I be given District day immediately following the disposition of the military appropriation bill.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, that very likely will be a week in advance, and I do not think we ought to tie up the time that far ahead.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask immediate consideration of the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 45.

Resolved by the House (the Senate concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Monday, the 27th day of May, 1918, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, for the purpose of receiving such communication as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RUSSELL. To call up the bill H. R. 12229, the special order for this morning.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I am perfectly willing that the time until the joint meeting of the two Houses be used in consideration of these pension bills, but I do not think they ought to stand in the way of two big appropriation bills. The Committee on Military Affairs is awaiting with its Army bill my getting out of the way with an urgent deficiency bill, and if the gentleman will give me assurance he will not press these matters after 1 o'clock——

Mr. RUSSELL. I will agree with the gentleman from Kentucky that if we do not finish these bills before the hour mentioned, we will get out of the way and take them up at some other time.

Mr. SHERLEY. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12229) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to consider this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know whether the agreement the gentleman made with the gentleman from Kentucky a little while ago refers to all pension bills to come up to-day.

Mr. RUSSELL. I could not commit anybody except myself. There are two on the calendar from the Invalid Pension Committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is not assuming to commit the Committee on Pensions?

Mr. RUSSELL. No; I have no authority to do that and I so stated to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. All right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill H. R. 12229 was read for amendment, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12229) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.
